By Mr. CHURCH (for himself and Mr. HANSEN) (by request):

S. 2818. A bill to amend and supplement the acreage limitation and residency provisions of the Federal reclamation laws, as amended and supplemented, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

FARM WATER ACT OF 1978

● Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I am joined today by Mr. HANSEN in introducing, by request, the Farm Water Act of 1978. This bill has been drafted by the Farm/Water National Alliance to Modernize the 1902 Water Law, an alliance of organizations interested in amending Federal reclamation law.

I have already introduced legislation on this subject cosponsored by seven of our colleagues. My bill, S. 2606, the Reclamation Reform Act of 1978, is substantially different from the farm/water bill.

However, this group has spent a great deal of time and effort in an endeavor to provide Congress with a comprehensive legislative proposal on the very complex subject of reclamation law. Their proposal deals with most of the key issues that must be addressed in any meaningful reform of the 1902 act and, as a result, will be of assistance to the Energy and Natural Resources Committee in its upcoming review of the 160-acre limitation controversy. Hearings are scheduled before the committee on this matter for April 12 and 13.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a list of those organizations that are associated with Farm/Water, a summary of the Farm Water Act of 1978, and the text of the Farm Water Act of 1978 be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material and bill were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ORGANIZATIONS

Organizations that have participated in the formation of the Farm/Water National Alliance To Modernize The 1902 Water Law and/or the drafting of this bill include, among others:

National Water Resources Association.
Water Resources Congress.
Individual water districts in California, Arizona, Oregon, Washington, Idaho, Colorado, Oklahoma.
U.S. Chamber of Commerce.
American Bankers Association.
National Cotton Council.
National Council of Farmer Cooperatives.
Mortgage Bankers Association of America.
California Westside Farmers.
Several state and local farm organizations.
Imperial Resources Association.
United Fresh Fruit and Vegetable Association.

SUMMARY OF FARM WATER ACT OF 1978

PURPOSE

The purpose of this bill is to liberalize the landholdings of the reclamation law by increasing the basic ownership from 160 acres per person to one-half section in return for a restriction on windfall profits for a period of 10 years. The Act also, for the first time, would recognize that the reclamation law must either provide the social benefit of breaking up individual landholdings or be paid for without subsidy by the users of the project. It in effect gives the users a choice. They can pay for the project and escape the limitations of reclamation law or receive the subsidized benefits and reduce their land ownership to three hundred and twenty (320) acres.

EXPLANATION

Section 3—Definitions.—"Written Representations", can be either a contract or opinion, or other administrative interpretations or rulings implementing Federal reclamation law.

A "Contracting Entity" includes individual landowners who may have entered into recordable contracts, as well as irrigation districts.

The "Landowner" definition includes a requirement that an owner of reclamation land must be a citizen of the United States.

"Project" and "Project Water" are defined in such a way as to include only those projects and under reclamation law in which new water, that would not have been available for those facilities, is introduced under a contract with a contracting entity to the project area.

Section 4—This section would validate all of the written representations made on behalf of the United States under the Federal Reclamation Law including not only specific contractual rights but also such writings as solicitors' opinions on which contracting entities and individual landowners have relied in the past.

Section 5—This section would establish an ownership limitation of three hundred and twenty (320) acres of the Class I land in place of the present one hundred and sixty (160) acres. There is also provided an equivalency provision which would allow larger acreages where the land does not have the same productivity, because of topography, soil characteristics, adequacy of water supply, crop adaptability, cost of crop production, or length of growing season equivalent to the Class I land. The additional acreage would be established by the Secretary of Interior after hearings and he cannot limit project water until such hearings have been held.

This section also preserves present law by allowing a lender that acquires the property by foreclosure, to sell the land without price approval within a five year period. Corporate or individual trustees and landowners which are other than a natural person may hold land eligible to receive water provided that the underlying beneficial owners are qualified as individual owners.

Section 6—This section provides for certain defined exemptions from reclamation law. It introduces the payout concept which permits a district to either pay the full amount of the obligation or make periodic payments with interest and thereby relieve the property within that district from the application of excess land laws.

The interest rate is to be either contractual or the average rate paid by the United States on its marketable securities during the construction period.

In addition other lands are exempt depending on certain sources of water. These include temporary project water, water which is merely diverted or regulated such as in Corps of Engineers Projects, water which reaches property through unavoidable seepage, deep percolation, or ground water recharge. Land would also be exempt if it receives 15% or less of its irrigation needs from project water.

Section 7—A certification provision is provided for clearing title to lands of the acreage limitations when the project has been paid for.

Section 8—This section would provide that the three hundred and twenty (320) acreage limitation would be increased to reflect the decreasing amount of project water supplied to a project above the 50% threshold amount.

Section 9—This section deals with the requirements of a recordable contract and its provisions in order to qualify land in excess of three hundred and twenty (320) acres to receive project water. It provides that a landowner may designate his non-excess lands, a contract is not required until the water is delivered, the owner is entitled to sell his excess land to the buyer of his choice at its fair market value without reference to the project water, land can be sold at any time prior to the exercise of the power of attorney under recordable contract and that non-agricultural uses of the property can be retained by an excess owner.

Section 10—This section provides, for the first time, an anti-speculation provision in reclamation law. A landowner or his family or beneficiaries under his will or gifts would have to retain the property for ten years before it could be sold for anything more than his costs plus an allowance for cost of living increase.

Section 11—This section repeals the residency requirement of the 1902 Act.

Section 12—This section provides that the Act will apply only to existing projects or by contract to future projects, no previous exemptions are repealed, individual contracts may be amended to conform to the more liberal provisions of this Act, and only provisions of Federal reclamation laws which are inconsistent with this Act are amended. It allows the Secretary to request a court to terminate the right to receive water when there are fraudulent misrepresentations of the sale price or ownership.

Section 13—This section grants contracting entities the right to bring the United States into court for purposes of resolving conflicts in reclamation law.

Section 14—This section restates the language of section 46 of the Omnibus Adjustment Act of 1926 which is not changed by other provisions of this Act and eliminate language which is no longer needed.

S. 2818

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act shall be a supplement to the Act of June 17, 1902 and acts supplementary thereof and amendatory thereto (47 U.S.C. 371) hereinafter referred to as the Federal reclamation laws, and this Act may be cited as the "Farm Water Act of 1978."

PREAMBLE

SEC. 2. The purpose of this Act is to:

(1) Encourage and preserve the pattern of viable family farm operations within Federal reclamation projects;

(2) Permit a wide distribution and enjoyment of the benefits of farm lands within said projects and recognize that all taxpayers of the nation contribute to project costs and that none of those who so contribute should be disqualified from sharing the benefits thereof;

(3) Provide for recognition of variations in climate and soil classification in Federal reclamation project service areas; and

(4) Aid in the maintenance and enhancement of the fiscal integrity of Federal water projects which provide irrigation benefits and encourage payment of water charges and construction costs, where feasible, without subsidy.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 3. As used throughout this Act, the following terms are defined as, and shall mean:

(a) "All Written Representations" shall mean all written representations, opinions, and administrative interpretations and rulings which relate to a "contract" as hereafter defined or other implementation of Federal reclamation laws.

(b) "Contract" shall mean a contract with the United States of America concerning a project constructed or operated pursuant to Federal reclamation laws, as amended and supplemented or executed pursuant thereto, whether or not repayment is involved including, without limitation, construction, irrigation, drainage or storage contracts.

(c) "Contracting Entity" shall mean any irrigation district, water user, or water user entity, individual or other entity that contracts with the United States of America concerning a project constructed or operated pursuant to Federal reclamation laws, as amended and supplemented, whether or not repayment is involved.

(d) "Landowner" shall mean any person or entity, public or private, or combination of one or more such persons or entities that is a citizen of the United States.

(e) "Project" shall mean a project constructed or operated for the production, storage, impoundment, release or delivery of irrigation water under the authority of or pursuant to the Federal reclamation laws, as amended and supplemented.

(f) "Project Water" shall mean water which, but for the construction of the project facilities, would not have been available for irrigation of land within a project service area, which exceeds the amount of water available for irrigating land within said service area prior to construction of the project's facilities and is the subject of a contract with a contracting entity. All other water shall be deemed to be non-project water.

VALIDATION

SEC. 4. Except to the extent that they are inconsistent with the provisions of this Act all provisions of contracts relating to the acreage limitation provisions of Federal reclamation law and all written representations relating thereto which were in effect or made prior to the effective date of the Act by the Secretary of Interior Commissioner or contracting officer of the Bureau of Reclamation (formerly Reclamation Service) or their authorized agents on behalf of the United States with or for the benefit of a contracting entity, or a landowner, are hereby verified, ratified and confirmed as of the date of execution of the contract or the making of said representation.

ACREAGE LIMITATIONS AND EQUIVALENCY

SEC. 5. (a) Notwithstanding any other provisions of the law to the contrary, the amount of non-excess land held in private ownership by any one landowner which is eligible to receive project water in each project, shall be three hundred and twenty (320) acres of Class I land or the equivalent thereof in other lands of less productive potential, as determined by the Secretary of Interior, taking into account all factors which significantly affect productivity, including but not limited to topography, soil characteristics, adequacy of water supply, crop adaptability, costs of crop production, and length of growing season. The Secretary shall establish an acreage equivalency formula for each project service area, including those cases where pre-project land classification surveys already exist. The Secretary shall hold public hearings in the area affected before establishing an equivalency formula and making an equivalency determination. There shall be no enforcement of the acreage limitation in a particuar project or unit thereof, by way of withholding water deliveries or otherwise, until an equivalency classification shall have been made for the affected service area.

(b) If excess land is acquired by foreclosure or other process of law, by conveyance in satisfaction of mortgages, by inheritance, or by devise, or become excess by reason thereof, project water therefor may be furnished temporarily for a period not exceeding five years from the effective date of such acquisition, delivery of water thereafter ceasing unless, or until, the transfer thereof is completed to a landowner duly qualified to secure project water therefor. The sale price thereof shall be without regard to the provisions of Sections 9 or 10 of this Act.

(c) A landowner which is a corporate or other trustee may collectively hold land eligible to receive project water notwithstanding the acreage limitation of this Section 3, in a fiduciary capacity, provided that with respect to such holding, the beneficiary or beneficiaries thereof are in compliance with the acreage limitation provisions of the Federal reclamation laws.

(d) A landowner which is other than a natural person may hold up to 320 acres of land eligible to receive project water provided that the owner, or owners, of such entity are in compliance with the acreage limitation provisions of Federal reclamation law in the same manner and with substantially the same rights as a landowner.

APPLICATION OF ACREAGE LIMITATIONS

SEC. 6. In the case of any project or unit or division thereof which was authorized before the effective date of this Act:

(a) The acreage limitation provisions of the Federal reclamation law shall not apply to:

(1) Land within a contracting entity which makes the lump-sum payment, or has otherwise paid, the balance remaining due on a contractual construction obligation incurred for project water;

(2) Land within a contracting entity which agrees to pay interest periodically in accordance with subparagraph (b) of this section, on the balance remaining due on a contractual construction obligation incurred for project water;

(3) Land within a contracting entity receiving project water on a temporary basis and pursuant to a contract which provides for recapture of such water for municipal or industrial purposes at a later time;

(4) Land receiving water made available by project facilities which does not exceed the amount of water that was diverted and used for irrigating land within a contracting entity service area prior to construction of the project facilities, or water which is merely regulated by the project facilities;

(5) Land utilizing water which occurs as a result of unavoidable seepage or deep percolation from the irrigation or from the drainage of lands within a service area of a contracting entity;

(6) Land utilizing water which, after having been used for some other project purpose, is used for groundwater recharge;

(7) Land receiving water that has been commingled with project water, or receiving project water for which non-project water has been exchanged or substituted or receiving project water as a substitute supply for water otherwise available to the project area;

(8) Land receiving project water which is used to supply less than fifteen percent of the irrigation water necessary for that land as computed in a year of average precipitation or other supply of non-project water; or

(9) Land within the service area of a contracting agency served by a project constructed and operated by the United States Army Corps of Engineers primarily as a flood control project, but having attendant irrigation benefits for which the contracting agency has been required to contract through the Bureau of Reclamation.

(b) The interest rate applicable for purposes of this section shall be computed on a project-by-project basis in accordance with the specified project interest rate or, is none exists, such rate shall be equal to the average rate paid by the United States on its marketable long-term securities issued during the construction period of each project.

CERTIFICATION

SEC. 7. Within 90 days of the effective date of this Act if repayment has previously occurred, or within 90 days following payment, the Secretary of Interior shall issue a certificate in recordable form to the contracting entity or landowner acknowledging that the land is free of the limitations of Section 5 of the Reclamation Act of 1902, as amended or supplemented and the acreage limitations of the Federal reclamation laws.

WATER EQUIVALENCY

SEC. 8. For the purpose of determining whether a landowner holds exces land, the number of irrigable acres of each tract supplied with project water shall be multiplied by a percentage which equals the percentage that project water would constitute of the total irrigation water supply to the tract in a year of average precipitation or other supply of non-project water: provided, that, if less than fifty percent of the total irrigation supply of water is supplemental project water, as computed in a year of average precipitation, such acres shall not be counted at all.

EXCESS LAND CONTRACTS

SEC. 9. (a) No irrigable land held in private ownership by any one landowner in excess of three hundred and twenty (320) irrigable acres shall receive project water if the landowner thereof shall refuse to execute a valid recordable contract for the sale of such land.

(b) An excess landowner may designate which land shall receive project water as nonexcess land.

(c) No recordable contracts need be signed until project water is delivered to the landowner.

(d) If excess is sold by a landowner or pursuant to a recordable contract, the landowner shall be entitled to transfer the land to a landowner of his choice duly qualified to receive project water therefor and receive the fair market value of the land sold without project water at the time of sale as though no project water had ever been delivered.

(e) Excess land subject to a recordable contract, which is not sold within the 10-year period, shall continue to be eligible to receive project water until said land is sold by the landowner or otherwise disposed of under the terms of the excess land contract.

(f) Upon sale or other disposition of excess land under recordable contract or otherwise pursuant to the Federal reclamation laws, in addition to such sale or other disposition being subject to then existing easements and rights-of-way, the seller shall not retain any interest in the land other than (1) the right to explore for and produce minerals therefrom, including geothermal water, coal, oil, gas, associated hydrocarbons, and other fossil fuels, (2) the right to use the surface for purposes other than agricultural crop production, and (3) a purchase money mortgage or other purchase money security interest.

ANTISPECULATION

SEC. 10. (a) Excess land sold after the effective date of this Act, shall be eligible to receive project water only if title to the land is made subject to a condition that the land shall not be sold at a price greater than the landowner's cost for the land, plus the value of any improvements, increased only by the rate of increase of the consumer price index for the period between the date of that landowner's purchase and his sale of the land: Provided, That if a land owner, or any subsequent landowner taking title by gift or devise from such landowner, has continuously owned the land as nonexcess land for a period of ten or more years prior to sale, the sale price of the land may thereafter be, at the fair market value thereof without reference to this section.

(b) The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to effect compliance with this section by approving or disapproving the price of land sold subject to this section.

RESIDENCY NOT REQUIRED

SEC. 11. Section 5 of the Act of June 17, 1902, 32 Stat. 389, is hereby amended by deleting from the second sentence the words: "and no such sale shall be made to any landowner unless he shall be an actual bona fide resident on such land, or occupant thereof residing in the neighborhood of said land."

APPLICATION

SEC. 12. (a) This Act shall apply both to existing Federal reclamation projects and to projects or units thereof constructed in the future, except where the contrary is expressly indicated by this Act or by contract.

(b) Nothing in this Act shall repeal or amend other statutory exemptions from any acreage limitation of the Federal reclamation laws. Any contracting entity which has heretofore been afforded exemption from or modified application of acreage limitation provisions heretofore in effect may elect to continue to be governed by such provisions; provided, however, that no such election shall preclude the options available to a landowner by Section 6 of this Act.

(c) The Secretary of Interior shall, upon the request of a contracting entity or of a landowner as to any land of such landowner within a contracting entity, amend any contract to conform to the provisions of this Act.

(d) Upon proof of fraudulent representation as to the true consideration or ownership involved in sales subject to the price limitations of Federal reclamation laws, a court of competent jurisdiction, upon application by the Secretary of the Interior, is authorized to cancel the right to receive project water or any water right attaching to the land involved in such fraudulent sales.

(d) Except to the extent that they are inconsistent with the provisions of this Act, the other Federal reclamation laws, including those provisions relating to the implementation of the acreage limitations, shall remain in full force and effect.

CONSENT TO SUE

SEC. 13. Consent is given to join the United States as a necessary party defendant in any suit to adjudicate, confirm, validate or decree the contractual rights of a contracting entity and the United States regarding any contract executed pursuant to the Federal reclamation laws. The United States, when a party to any such suit, shall be deemed to have waived any right to plead that the state laws are inapplicable or that the United States is now amenable thereto by reason of its sovereignty, and shall be subject to the judgments, orders and decree of the court having jurisdiction, any may obtain review thereof, in the same manner to the same extent as a private individual under like circumstances.

CONSTRUCTION CONTRACT

SEC. 14. Section 46 of the Act of May 25, 1926, 44 Stat. 636, is hereby amended to read as follows:

"No water shall be delivered upon the completion of any new project or new division of a project until a contract or contracts in form approved by the Secretary of the Interior shall have been made with an irrigation district or irrigation districts organized under State law providing for payment by the district or districts of the cost of constructing, operating, and maintaining the works during the time they are in control of the United States, such cost of constructing to be repaid within such terms of years as the Secretary may find to be necessary, in any event not more than fifty years from the date of public notice hereinafter referred to, and the execution of said contract or contracts shall have been confirmed by a decree of a court of competent jurisdiction which shall be binding upon the parties thereto including the United States: Provided, That the operation and maintenance changes on account of lands in said projects and divisions shall be paid annually in advance not later than March 1. It shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to give public notice when water is actually available, and the operation and maintenance charges payable to the United States for the first year after such public notice shall be transferred to and paid as a part of the construction payment." ●

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

THE DEPRESSED COPPER MARKET SITUATION IN ARIZONA

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, the depressed copper market situation in Arizona has become so drastic that widespread layoffs in my State reached a peak of approximately 8,000 workers in September 1977. The projected loss of personal income in the State could reach over $100 million if this crisis is not relieved. Recently, the House of Representatives of the State of Arizona passed a concurrent memorial which urges the President and the Congress to take whatever action may be necessary to restore the economic health of the copper mining industry. I ask that this concurrent memorial be printed in the RECORD.

The concurrent memorial follows:

HOUSE CONCURRENT MEMORIAL 2002

Whereas, the depressed copper market situation in Arizona has resulted in widespread layoffs in this State, reaching a peak of approximately eight thousand workers in September of 1977; and

Whereas, it is estimated that two thousand to three thousand of those workers will not be recalled at all; and

Whereas, some three thousand five hundred additional jobs linked to the copper layoffs and delayed mine openings could also be lost; and

Whereas, the projected loss of personal income in this State resulting from the copper crisis could reach over one hundred million dollars; and

Whereas, the loss of personal income adversely affects retail trade and tax revenues in this State; and

Whereas, the closure of mining activities and the layoff of thousands of copper industry employees constitute a serious threat to the local economies of several Arizona communities; and

Whereas, the degree to which the towns will be able to weather the crisis depends on how quickly the mines recover; and

Whereas, the mining industry has often been called the workhorse of the Arizona economy; and

Whereas, Arizona alone supplies over half of the newly mined copper in the United States annually; and

Whereas, the United States copper industry is facing increasing competition from foreign producers who often operate on government subsidies; and

Whereas, the demand for copper on the world market has fallen sharply; and

Whereas, environmental regulations in the United States add significantly to the costs of operating the mines in Arizona. Wherefore your memorialist, the House of Representatives of the State of Arizona, the Senate concurring, prays:

1. That the President and the Congress of the United States authorize and implement the purchase and stockpiling of sufficient quantities of copper to remedy the current situation.

2. That the President and the Congress of the United States consider the imposition of an environmental tariff on foreign producers who are not required to meet high pollution control standards and attendant costs.

3. That the President and the Congress of the United States take all other appropriate and necessary steps to restore economic health to the ailing copper industry.

4. That the Secretary of State of the State of Arizona transmit copies of this Memorial to the President of the United States, the President of the United States Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the United States and to each Member of the Arizona Congressional Delegation.

PRESERVATION AND CONSERVATION OF ALASKA WILDERNESS LANDS

● Mr. RIEGLE. Mr. President, an article recently appeared in the Detroit Free Press which I believe will be of interest to my colleagues. The editorial which I am submitting for the RECORD concerns the pending legislation in the House relating to the preservation and conservation of Alaska wilderness lands.

I ask that the newspaper editorial which I now send to the desk be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial follows:

A CHANCE TO SAVE ALASKA'S BEST

Alaska is the site of America's last rendezvous with the wilderness. Its sentinel mountains and mirror-bright lakes, its rushing rivers and fragile, mossy tundra are the last unspoiled outposts of creation—and they belong to us, to all of us. But we are in danger of seeing them despoiled.

If we have learned anything since the first settler's shadow fell across the lower 48 states, it is how vulnerable the wild places are, how quickly and irreparably they are destroyed by exploitation and development. And the pressure of the developers on the Alaskan wilderness is increasing steadily.

That is why it is imperative to set aside as much of the wilderness as possible, before it is too late. The vehicle for doing so is the Alaskan lands bill now before Congress, which would preserve nearly 100 million acres in national parks, forests, wildlife refuges and wild and scenic river systems.

The bill, which will be taken up by the House Interior Committee in mid-February, is under attack from timber, mineral and oil companies, and others who seek to defeat it by delaying or weakening it. They have falsely labeled it a "lock-up" bill, claiming it will prevent the development of vitally needed resources.

The truth is that the bill was drawn to exclude the areas richest in proven mineral wealth, and that even some of the lands in it will be open for managed resource development. It leaves 75 percent of the land in Alaska still open to mineral development, 80 percent of its commercial timber available for logging and at least 60 percent of the land open for sport hunting. Only shortsighted greed would demand more.

What will be set aside are areas of unparalleled beauty and special fragility: tumbling rivers, steep-walled fjords, forest watersheds, remnants of the Pleistocene glaciers, Arctic sand dunes, volcanic craters, majestic mountain ranges. And all of these wonders are more accessible to Americans today than were the cliffs of Yellowstone in 1872, when conservationists successfully fought developers in a battle virtually identical to the one now being waged over Alaska.

We have often rued the decisions of part generations that have despoiled the land; we have never criticized them for preserving it. Beauty and grandeur and long miles of unbroken wilderness are forms of national wealth, too. Long after we have mined and looted the rest of the planet, the Alaskan frontier can be a source of spiritual riches, our link backward to creation and forward to the future. But only if we act now to preserve it.●

A QUOTE FROM WILL ROGERS

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, all too often these days, we hear the argument that the Soviet Union is building its vast military potential for defense reasons only. I personally dispute that contention for the kind of military buildup going on inside Russia today far exceeds that required to defend her territory in the event of invasion. In this connection, I recently ran across a quote from Will Rogers which was published on March 12, 1932, and which I believe is very appropriate to the situation today.

I submit these two paragraphs from the great American sage for the RECORD.

The material follows:

WILL ROGERS

"We just got to be better prepared than we are. I want to tell you, war is a business with some other nations. When a war shows up, they don't have to stop and put in a draft and sing songs and appoint dollar-a-year men. Their soldiers are trained between wars—not after one starts. You see, we have been lucky that way, all of our wars have waited on us till we could get ready. But one day we may have one where the enemy won't wait.

"You think that's just kidding? Well, you are just another Senator, if you do!"—March 12, 1932.●

TECHNOLOGY TRANSFER FROM FEDERAL LABORATORIES

● Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the importance of bringing new technologies to prospective users in a swift and orderly manner. This does not happen automatically; too often we have attended hearings and found that overlapping programs in diverse Federal agencies have led to unnecessary duplication of efforts, simply because the principals of such programs were not aware of what had already been done elsewhere in the Government. The problem is even more acute among governments of different States, where there is no statutory commitment to exchange information.

The art of applying a scientific innovation from one specialized area to another is known as technology transfer. In years past all Americans have benefitted by spinoffs from large programs at NASA or the Department of Defense; the fact that most commercial airplanes originated as military transport planes is well known. Yet, in addition to these highly visible spinoffs, there have been thousands of quieter, less noticeable transfers of technology taking place at the same time. These occur most often because individual scientists and engineers take an interest in a field which at first seems to bear no relation to their specialty, but in fact contains very similar challenges to those they have already faced.

One way in which Congress has aided technology transfer in the past is through the Intergovernmental Personnel Act (IPA), by which Federal agencies exchange workers with State and local governments or universities. Further evidence for the value of this program recently came to me in a letter from Gov. Robert W. Straub of Oregon, in which the Governor clearly illustrates the need to continue and expand such programs in technology transfer.

Mr. President, I ask that Governor Straub's letter to me be printed in the RECORD.

The letter follows:

OFFICE OF THE GOVERNOR,
Salem, Oreg., March 2, 1978.

Hon. MARK O. HATFIELD,
U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SENATOR HATFIELD: On 1 November, 1976, I established, within the Executive Branch, the Office of Technology Transfer (OTT) for a two-year trial basis. Its purpose was to provide a single contact point within the state where my staff, the legislators, or any local government employee could go to find technical or scientific assistance to solve a particular problem. The objective was to make better use of existing technology, ideas and innovations available in Federal agencies, private industries and local and state government organizations so we in Oregon would not have to re-invent the proverbial wheel.

To head this office, we acquired, through an IPA agreement, the services of a scientist from the U.S. Naval Ocean Systems Center in San Diego, California. Upon his arrival, we were well into a drought year, and shortly thereafter legislation was introduced in the House to launch an immediate cloud-seeding program. Through the efforts of the OTT, two Navy scientists who were international weather modification experts, came to Oregon to offer technical advice to my office and the Legislature, and to conduct actual cloud-seeding demonstration flights. This was done at no cost to the State. This assistance was available because the Navy installation belonged to an organization called the Federal Laboratory Consortium for Technology Transfer.

This consortium is an informal voluntary group of 100 plus federal research laboratories, representing such major federal agencies as Energy, Defense, Transportation, Agriculture, Interior, NASA, Commerce and Justice. Its purpose is to actively seek secondary uses of federally funded and created technology by applying that knowledge to the solution of problems faced by private industry and public agencies.

Since the cloud-seeding experience, we have received additional assistance from various consortium members in such diverse areas as bridge inspection and maintenance, fire retardant material suitable for use in prison mattresses, soft body armor for local police departments, and spray-on material for reducing street road bed erosion caused by heavy rain. Thus, we at the state and local level in Oregon have repeatedly and significantly benefitted from the knowledge and cooperation of the Federal Laboratary Consortium members.

Recently, I found that the Consortium is facing difficult times. Because it is a voluntary, information organization, most of the agencies involved neither fund nor actively support their member laboratories. Each laboratory participates on its own volition and at its own level of effort. As a result, some of the stronger agencies, such as Defense, are reducing or even eliminating their technology transfer program, as budget and manpower ceilings are reduced. To lose this proven resource would be unfortunate. It appears to me that now is the time for Congress and the federal agencies to formally organize, fund and support the Federal Technology Transfer Consortium.

Based on the success of our own OTT, I have decided to permanently establish an Office of Science and Technology in the Executive Branch, and to seek legislative approval and funding to make sure this service is available to the citizens of Oregon in the years to come. The Federal Laboratory Consortium can and should be one of the principal technical resources for this office. It can only be so if it is an effective and viable organization. I am, therefore, requesting your assistance in formally establishing and supporting the Federal Laboratory Consortium so we in Oregon can continue to use their technological knowledge to improve the quality of life for all Oregonians.

Sincerely,

BOB,
Governor.

Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, it would be sad indeed if the initial effort made by the State of Oregon in this instance were lost due to failure of the Federal Government to pursue the goals of technology transfer. Other States would suffer as well, for we all could draw upon the wealth of technology extant within the federally funded laboratories.

In this respect, it is heartening to learn that the Department of Commerce, through its National Bureau of Standards, is starting an effort in cooperative technology intended to improve means of transferring technology among industries, universities, and agencies of government. This is the kind of commitment by an agency that leads in the long run to both a healthier science community and a healthier economy.

Unfortunately, we know only too well that the longrun view is not the only view. As Governor Straub reports, it is easy to reduce technology transfer programs in order to meet budget and manpower constraints. As Senators, we have it in our power to ask witnesses at hearings what they intend to do about technology transfer, to inquire as to the depth of their commitment to it, and to insure that technology transfer is not given second-class treatment by the Federal agencies. I believe the interests of our taxpayers can be well served by doing so, especially when we circumvent need for several different States to pursue the same research programs. I intend to ask Federal managers to account for their technology transfer programs, and I encourage other Senators to do the same.●

A PANAMANIAN SUMMARY OF THE AGREEMENT OF PRINCIPLES CONCLUDED BETWEEN PANAMA AND THE UNITED STATES

● Mr. GOLDWATER. Mr. President, throughout the treaties debate there seems to have risen some confusion regarding the benefits that might accrue to Gen. Omar Torrijos under documents presented to us for ratification. I wish to point out that there apparently is no such confusion in the Panamanian Government on this issue. And to illustrate my comment, I recently had translated a Panamanian Government document entitled "This Is the Beginning of the End of the Colonial Enclave." The document is a Panamanian summary of the agreement of principles concluded between Panama and the United States.

Because I feel this is important to all Members of the Senate during the debate, I ask that the translation of the Panamanian document be printed in the RECORD.

The translation follows:

OMAR

A summary of the agreement of principles concluded between Panama and the United States

. . . to jointly study the feasibility of the canal in question and, possibly, negotiate for the purpose of arriving at an agreement on its construction under the conditions stipulated by the Republic of Panama and the U.S. at that time.

ECONOMIC ASPECTS

Panama shall receive the following amounts:

I. From the Operation of the Panama Canal:

(A) An average of $80 yearly for the period of 23 years (a total of $1.840 billion). The larger amount of these revenues shall be subject to an inflationary increase correctional clause to the extent that the yearly amount retain its purchase power as based on the year 1977.

The following is a breakdown of the above amount:

(i) Thirty (30) cents for each ton of cargo passed through the Panama Canal. Yearly average: $55 million.

(ii) The yearly amount of $20 million of which $10 shall be guaranteed yearly. The yearly payment of the other $10 million shall depend on the Canal's net revenues. Any differences that may occur in one year shall be paid in the following years.

NLRB MISAPPLICATION OF FACTS

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. President, with the events of the recent coal strike so fresh in our minds, and with the understanding that labor reform is an issue which will be debated here in the Senate later this spring, I would like to call Senators' attention to an editorial which appeared in the Wall Street Journal, March 31, 1978. This editorial sets out what I view as a shocking and unconscionable turn of events. A judge at the National Labor Relations Board has misapplied the facts in a dispute between J. P. Stevens and the Textile Workers Union, with the result that the law was interpreted to accommodate the judge's, not the workers', intentions. The editorial speaks for itself, outlining three clear instances of misapplication of the law.

If a judge is free to make such decisions as this one, then I would suggest that any legislation we might consider, no matter what our personal or political views, is superfluous. I deplore the actions this judge has taken, and encourage Senators to take heed of this episode in making their decisions to grant even greater powers to unions and the National Labor Relations Board, with no concomitant power in management.

I ask that the text of the editorial be printed at the coclusion of my remarks.

COMING ATTRACTIONS, 1984

As we now are following with renewed interest the 15-year campaign of the textile union to organize J. P. Stevens Co., the latest development is especially absorbing. A National Labor Relations administrative law judge—Joel Harmatz—has declared the union to be the bargaining agent for 1,000 employes at Stevens' plants and warehouses in Wallace, N.C., even though a majority of the employes there voted against the union in a 1975 election.

We have examined Mr. Harmatz's decision and can report what has been going on. It will make particularly interesting reading since the House just passed the AFL–CIO's

Labor Reform Bill, which gives union organizers new rights and further restricts what employers can do to fight back.

In the fall of 1974, the Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union successfully collected authorization cards from about half of the employes at the Wallace complex, the cards authorizing an NLRB election to determine whether or not a majority desired representation by the ACTWU.

On Feb. 19, 1975, 404 workers cast ballots for the union and 540 cast ballots against the union.

The ACTWU thereupon charged Stevens with unfair conduct leading up to the election, asked that the vote be disregarded and that it be declared the bargaining agent. After reviewing the charges, Mr. Harmatz deemed the authorization cards "a more reliable measure of employee choice than the results of the Feb. 19, 1975 election." He ordered Stevens to pay all the costs of litigation including the expenses of the union.

What did Stevens do that was so grossly unfair as to invalidate a secret-ballot election and elevate in its place a mere petition?

First, Stevens interfered with union distribution of campaign literature the day before the election. In the weeks preceding the election, the union distributed its literature outside the plant gate and via mail and in person at the homes of the workers. On Feb. 18, the union abruptly switched tactics and began handing out literature inside the plant. Supervisors ordered the workers to cease. In the hearings, Stevens conceded that the workers should not have been stopped as long as they were in nonwork areas, but that the supervisors were not aware of this fine-point in labor law and were reacting to the abrupt change in the union's practice (which almost seemed designed to elicit a technical violation).

Second, Stevens has a profit-sharing plan for its employes. In 1974 when the stock market hit bottom, the value of the invested funds sank with it and employes were alarmed. One of Stevens' competitors, Burlington Industries, had the same problem. On September 19, 1974, Burlington announced a revision of its profit-sharing plan to give employes some protection against market fluctuations. On January 17, 1975, Stevens followed suit. The union charged dirty pool, saying Stevens, unlike Burlington, did not have the interests of the workers at heart, only removing a grievance that would help the union win the election.

Third, on Sept. 30, 1974, 134 workers at the Wallace plant were laid off because of slack, drawing unemployment compensation of $68 per week. If they had been laid off the next day, Oct. 1, they would have drawn $90 per week because of a change then taking place in North Carolina law. Stevens, having checked with the state bureaucracy, thought the workers would get the new, higher rate. It tried to clear up the misunderstanding, but the state refused to budge. On February 11, 1975, Stevens said it would pay them the difference itself. Again, dirty pool, said the ACTWU and administrative law Judge Harmatz.

In these violations Mr. Harmatz finds a "pattern of unlawful conduct." He was horrified, "No end appears to this unrelenting effort to exhaust the resources of this union in the hope that eventually it will be left with no alternative other than complete withdrawal." And because of the inability of the union to distribute literature inside the plant, because of a change in profit sharing and because of extra payments to the unemployed, it seems, 540 workers were so confused their ballots can't be counted.

For Mr. Harmatz's remedy is not to order a new election, but simply to declare the losers the winners. The union did get about half of the workers to sign authorization cards, and he declares this the "more reliable measure of employe choice." No matter that the cards are often sold as simply election petitions. No matter that they are gathered face to face, maybe or maybe not by smiling union organizers in dark alleys. If you signed a card for an election to get the organizer off your back, it counts as a vote for the union. But it does not count if you vote against the union by secret ballot.

George Orwell couldn't have dreamed up a better example of Doublethink. 1984, here we come.

EAST-WEST TRADE IS GOOD FOR AMERICA—AN ADDRESS BY ALAN A. REICH, DEPUTY ASSISTANT SECRETARY FOR EAST-WEST TRADE

● Mr. MARK O. HATFIELD. Mr. President, on March 8, 1978, Deputy Assistant Secretary for East-West Trade, Alan A. Reich of the Commerce Department, delivered the following speech at the Metrolina World Trade Club in Charlotte, N.C.

Given the importance of increased international trade to the renewed vitality of our domestic economy, the value of the dollar on foreign money markets, and a reduction of the massive trade deficit which this country has experienced during the past several months, Mr. Reich's speech is particularly timely and appropriate. It explains the benefits that East-West trade has brought to the United States and makes a strong case for its future expansion.

Mr. President, I commend this speech to my colleagues as a comprehensive and extremely interesting analysis of East-West trade today. I trust that they will take the time to review it at their earliest opportunity.

The speech follows:

EAST-WEST TRADE IS GOOD FOR AMERICA

It is a pleasure to meet with you here this evening in Charlotte, in the great state of North Carolina, home of Secretary of Commerce Kreps and temporary home of my undergraduate son. Charlotte's famous growth record and its position as a distribution center have earned it the title "second Atlanta." In Washington we know Charlotte as a center for major financial and legal institutions, for retailing and service industries, for the numerous Fortune 500 firms which have offices here, and as the recipient of important foreign investment from West Europe and elsewhere.

I have heard a great deal about your involvement with the world through international commerce. In particular, I am familiar with the contribution you have made to our national economy through exporting of such products as textile machinery, textile mill products, tobacco, lumber and wood, furniture, and chemicals.

Of special interest to me is the active commercial contact you have had with the communist nations, since my theme tonight will be "East-West Trade is Good for America." I shall describe why I feel East-West trade is good for America—its benefits to our economy, its contribution to mutual understanding, and its advantages for U.S. business. First, however, let me comment briefly on the world economic setting within which this process takes place.

ECONOMIC INTERDEPENDENCE IS A REALITY

In today's world, it is no longer possible to separate domestic and international issues. "Interdependence" has become a reality; the observation that economic fortunes move in tandem is one of the reigning platitudes of the day. Notwithstanding its repetition, the new level of interdependence remains insufficiently realized.

In the past, Americans had little cause to be concerned about economic problems beyond our borders. Our economy was relatively insular. We depended little on others for resources. We produced most of what we consumed and consumed most of what we produced Not any more. A foreign recession that reduces consumer demand doesn't cost foreign jobs alone; it can also cost American jobs. When the Soviet Union suffers a wheat crop failure, it is no cause for gloating. Their problem quickly becomes our problem too. The same applies to Caribbean sugar and Brazilian coffee. In fact, we have very nearly reached the day when the phrase "foreign recession" will have no meaning, for there will be no such thing as a recession that does not have universal consequences.

Americans have a real stake in expanding world trade. Last year our two-way trade amounted to $267 billion—$120 billion in exports and $147 billion in imports; the total was the highest in our history. And, consider these facts:

One out of every six manufacturing workers in the country produces for the export market.

One out of every three acres of American farmland produces for the export market.

Almost one out of every three dollars of U.S. corporate profits now derives from international activities—either from overseas investments or from export sales.

We depend on imports for more than one-fourth of our consumption of twelve of the fifteen key industrial raw materials we use.

The share of exports in our Gross National Product has doubled over the last decade to about 7 percent.

The Carter Administration is committed to the orderly expansion of world trade. The President has stated, "Because our total trade is greater than that of any other nation, we can, by increasing our trade activities, make an enormous contribution to the health of the international economy, to the job market at home and abroad, to progressive relationships between rich and poor nations, and finally, to the cause of peace on our globe."

The President is well aware that our policies must reflect these realities of economic interdependence and has made clear his commitment to the freer international movement of goods and services. You don't have to go far to find persuasive arguments for freer and fairer trade. You only need read history. Where trade is open, competition is vigorous and productivity is high in accordance with the rule that he who produces best and cheapest sells the most. Where trade is restricted, the opposite is true.

Today, the major challenge in the trade field is to resist further protectionism in this country and abroad. Periods of reduced economic performance always produce pressures to protect domestic markets against imports. Rather than perpetuate self-defeating and destructive restrictions, we must deal with and offset these pressures through expansion of trade. To pay for our rising imports, especially oil, the United States must pursue a more vigorous policy of increasing exports.

EXPORT EXPANSION IS IMPERATIVE

In 1977, United States had its worst trade deficit in history. It reached $27 billion, a four-fold increase from 1976. This jump reflected not only the unprecedented petroleum imports of $45 billion, but also the slowest rate of increase of U.S. exports since 1971.

This performance has shaken confidence in the dollar, which recently has continued its severe decline and created uncertainty in the international business community.

Depreciation of the dollar aggravates inflation, leads to misallocation of resources, and undermines economic growth. Adjustment of exchange rates by itself is not the answer. It helps. But we also must expand exports. Expanding exports in 1978 is not only desirable; it is imperative.

President Carter recently cabled all American Ambassadors, I quote: "Assistance to American business engaged in legitimate trade and investment activities is a vital element of our foreign economic policy. As such, it deserves your continuing personal attention. Trade expansion is particularly important at the present time. Sales abroad are needed to reduce unemployment and restrain protectionism at home, and to improve the nation's balance of payments. I ask you, as my representative, ensure that a high priority is placed on the trade expansion and other commercial programs in operation at your embassy." End quote.

We recognize that the United States has been less export-conscious than other nations. As I have said, exports account for less than 7 percent of our Gross National Product. That is the lowest percentage GNP of any industrial nation. For Japan the comparable figure is 12 percent, and for Great Britain it is over 20 percent. Of some 300,000 manufacturing firms in the United States, only about 25,000 export at all. Our estimates indicate that another 25,000 or so competitive in world markets.

The United States must develop an export mentality. Last year's huge $27 billion trade deficit could have a healthy effect—if it jars the U.S. business community into action to expand exports. In this effort we must exploit our opportunities. East-West trade is such an opportunity, for with a third of the world's population, the communist nations represent an enormous potential market for U.S. products.

EAST-WEST TRADE BENEFITS OUR ECONOMY

This bring me to the first of the three benefits East-West trade brings to America—namely its benefit to our economy. The United States engages in trade with other countries—not as a favor to them—but because trade benefits us. In the last three years the United States exported almost $10 billion worth of goods to the communist countries, achieving a $6.3 billion surplus in the process.

Last year two-way turnover in U.S. East-West trade totalled $3.8 billion, and we achieved a $1.4 billion surplus with the Soviet Union alone. Furthermore, Bureau of East-West Trade economists predict that 1978 will bring record volume and a $2 billion surplus year in U.S. trade with communist nations. Considering the large overall trade deficit I have mentioned, such surpluses provide much-needed relief.

The United States also benefits from the return flow of needed raw materials, including scarce metals and energy products. Seventy percent of our imports from the Soviet Union, for example, are petroleum products and non-ferrous metals and ores, such as platinum and chrome. The Soviets have large reserves of precious metals and energy resources which can be tapped to help sustain our industrial growth.

Our economists estimate that trade with the communist countries provides employment for well over 100,000 U.S. workers. Our exports of manufactured goods generate jobs in American industry. Follow-on sales of spare parts and supplies help ensure continuity of this employment. It does not follow, incidentally, that the imports I have mentioned mean the reduction of jobs, because in many cases the imports of raw materials from communist countries have the effect of increasing employment here. Thus, not only are our exports to communist countries creating jobs, our imports from them are maintaining jobs as well.

ACTIVE EAST-WEST TRADE FURTHERS MUTUAL UNDERSTANDING AND OVERALL RELATIONS

The second benefit of East-West trade is its contribution to the overall relations between the United States and the communist nations. The American people may well be ahead of their government in appreciation of this contribution. A public opinion poll last year, for example, showed that 66 percent of the American people favor expanded trade with the Soviet Union. Moreover, by a three-to-one majority, Americans indicated that they do not want to discriminate against the Soviet Union through tariff barriers and other trade restrictions. In addition to the recognition of the economic benefits, there is an underlying feeling among the American people that active commerce contributes to more peaceful relations.

Person-to-person contacts in trade relations advance mutual understanding and respect between Americans and communist nation counterparts. Such commercial interactions provide the important ingredients of international communication which best further understanding. Business negotiations engage influential citizens on both sides; they are substantive and serious; they are sustained over time; they are carried out on a face-to-face, eyeball-to-eyeball basis. Unlike so many forms of communications, they are two-way. Thousands (unfortunately, it is not millions) of person-to-person relationships developed by Americans in the course of doing business with the communist countries enhance the likelihood of identifying and working out more rational solutions to common problems.

Exposure to each other's beliefs, values, perceptions, and even misconceptions, helps overcome suspicion and break down false stereotypes. The more of us who know more of them and vice versa, the better. We may not agree, but we will understand better where and why we disagree. As Woodrow Wilson said, "When we truly know one another, we can have differences without hating one another." Thus commerce contributes to an overall climate in which there is less chance of miscalculation or resorting to extreme solutions resulting from ignorance, misunderstanding, or mindless hostility.

As the communist societies open up to Americans and other Westerners through business contacts, their peoples will understand better what we really are like. They will come to know that Americans are pragmatic, determined, hard working, and peace loving. To the extent peoples in these nations know us, their regimes may moderate somewhat the distortions in their propaganda about us.

The business ties already developed in the period of detente have exposed many communist officials in the Soviet Union, the People's Republic of China, and the nations of Eastern Europe to American businessmen eager to do business with them. Many mid-level officials who have risked their careers by advocating contact with the West will assume top leadership positions in the future. They have more accurate perceptions of Americans and presumably are more friendly toward us. We should continue to encourage those with Western orientation so that their hard-line adversaries are not proven right about the unreliability of Americans as partners in the pursuit of detente.

In the course of their negotiations with Americans, the communist technocrats and industrial leaders experience at first hand the advantages of Western-style management approaches such as rational decision-making, incentive management, team effort and open communications. This exposure to the free enterprise system can help lead, over time, to reduced rigidity and to decentralization of authority.

The more deeply and intricately involved in world economic matters the communist nations become, the greater will be their stake in developing a stable international economic system. This is in our national interest because attitudes of tension and confrontation only mean trouble for this system, which is very delicate.

Because commercial relations lead to tangible and visible results, they can serve as a constructive model in other areas of U.S. relations with the communist nations. They demonstrate that persistence and patience can lead to beneficial results. Above all, it is essential for both sides to realize trade is mutually beneficial and both sides gain from fostering it.

Commonsense dictates that these elements in our relationship be developed and strengthened. We could lose much by not trying. As President Carter stated in a message last year to the U.S.–U.S.S.R. Trade and Economic Council: "Bringing together businessmen from both countries for discussions on ways to expand economic, commercial and technical cooperation is important not only for its positive impact on the American and Soviet economies, but also because the expansion on bilateral trade helps maintain and strengthen the fabric of world peace." In addition, in his July speech in Charleston, South Carolina, President Carter urged identification and development of overlapping interests which are mutually beneficial, such as trade. The President spoke out specifically in favor of expanding U.S.-Soviet trade.

The third benefit of East-West trade is the profits it can bring to American companies who are interested in East-West trade. With one-third of the world's population and one-fourth of its land area, the communist countries represent a substantial market. Thousands of companies have found this trade profitable. An infrastructure has been developed. Twenty-five companies now maintain offices in Moscow; there are another fifteen in Warsaw. While the United States has about 20 percent of the world's total market of manufactured goods exports, we have less than 5 percent of the exports of these goods to the communist countries. If we succeed in removing the non-commercial barriers there is ample room for growth. Moreover, in recent years, the growth rate of trade between the market and the non-market economies has been greater than the growth within either of these two major world economic groupings.

SOME PROBLEMS IN EAST-WEST TRADE

I do not mean to imply there are not problems in East-West trade. In fact, they are considerable. I would mention three problems briefly. The first is the difficulty of meshing the centrally planned non-market economies with our own market economy. Foreign trade in communist countries is conducted by central government ministries through specialized foreign trade organizations. Sales potential depends generally on priorities set by the government—and not on market forces. Because of the different practices and structures, Western businessmen encounter many frustrations in the communist countries. Secondly, because the United States has been the late entrant in East-West trade, Western Europeans and Japanese businessmen have become established long before Americans. We continue to lag behind. Businessmen of those nations have personal relationships with their counterparts in communist countries, thereby increasing their competitive advantage.

Many American businessmen have said to me they only want to be allowed to compete on an equal basis. The third problem I would mention here is our inability to offer official export credits and non-discriminatory tariff treatment in all dealings with the communist countries. This again puts us at a disadvantage in many situations compared with competitors of other Western nations.

SOME EAST-WEST TRADE OPPORTUNITIES

There are problems, yes; but there are opportunities as well. The communist markets represent the following general kinds of opportunities for American firms.

Because of its vast land area and abundant reserves of a wide variety of natural resources, the Soviet Union undoubtedly offers the greatest potential for trade development. This is especially true if the United States and the Soviet Union cooperate in the exploration and development of Siberia. The U.S.S.R., for example, has more forest cover than any other country in the world. It has tremendous coal reserves and massive deposits of copper, nickel, manganese, platinum metals and chrome ore. Soviet gas reserves are estimated to be the largest in the world. Soviet oil production is now the world's highest. To exploit this potential, the Soviets have a need for imported technology. Oil production in fields west of the Urals has moderated and the rapid growth of West Siberian production may soon begin to level off.

Additional oil and gas will have to be developed off-shore and in the more inhospitable areas of Siberia. For those projects U.S. technology may be indispensable. Non-strategic technological products and capital equipment for basic industries may offer the largest growth opportunities for U.S. trade with the U.S.S.R. If these possibilities materialize, U.S. exports to the Soviet Union could rise from their present value of roughly $2 billion a year to the multi-billion-dollar-a-year range.

The Soviet Union often seeks to pay for capital goods imports through financial arrangements which are relatively unfamiliar to U.S. businessmen. One such form is "compensation arrangements," whereby the Western exporter accepts partial payment for his machinery and equipment in the form of future delivery of products produced with the equipment he has sold. Anxious to preserve scarce hard currency, the Soviets increasingly are emphasizing their large-scale projects. Such compensation arrangements in development of Siberian resources could greatly enhance future U.S. imports of energy products without an offsetting drain in our balance of payments.

Similar prospects are opening up for American business in the People's Republic of China. China at present limits its imports to what it can pay for, without entering into compensation deals for future payment. The PRC's import needs are potentially very large. Chinese officials have expressed priority interest in imports of Western machinery and equipment to modernize their iron and steel industry and their transport sector. The undeveloped transportation network constitutes an enormous bottleneck to economic progress in China. Both for domestic use and for increasing exports, rapid expansion of petroleum, petrochemical and coal production is also on the highest priority list. The PRC will also require massive imports of Western machinery (including textile manufacturing machinery) as well as know-how, including imports of entire plants.

I should also mention the continuing Chinese emphasis on developing their agricultural sector. They have begun to import tractors and modern, large-scale irrigation systems on a trial basis. The potential for sales of all types of agricultural chemicals and equipment to China is enormous. The Chinese population is still 80 percent rural, and both the Chinese egalitarian philosophy and their economic sense lead them to stress agrarian development, rather than merely concentrate on the industrial sectors.

At present, the United States sells less than $200 million worth of goods a year to the PRC. Our exports could rise soon to above a billion dollars a year if we take advantage of the opportunities that can open up.

Finally, a word about the longer-term prospects in the Eastern European countries. These are the most industrially advanced nations of the communist world. The German Democratic Republic, after all, was highly industrialized when it was a part of a united Germany. Czechoslovakia is also highly industrialized, and Poland and Hungary are not far behind. Romania and Bulgaria, on the other hand, may still be classified as less developed countries.

The most promising Eastern European markets from the point of view of U.S. trade are Poland, Romania, and Hungary. They are the most Western-oriented of the Eastern European countries with which the Bureau of East-West Trade deals. Poland has had Most Favored Nation tariff treatment from the United States—which is to say, normal, nondiscriminatory tariff treatment—since 1960. Romania, since 1975, and we hope Hungary will soon receive MFN. It is very significant that in contrast to the other Eastern European countries, both Poland and Romania are relatively independent of the U.S.S.R. for energy supplies. Poland has enormous coal reserves and Romania has the oldest petroleum industry in the world—predating even the first commercial discovery in the United States. Both these countries, however, are having development problems with their energy industries and are inviting targets for long-term U.S. sales of energy equipment and know-how.

Hungary, by contrast, is poor in energy and other natural resources, except for bauxite. Its attachment to the West is simply evidence of continuing, centuries-old cosmopolitanism. Hungary looks to the West, and to the U.S., for cooperative endeavors—including joint equity ownership—in several light industry sectors. Hungary, then, is a most attractive country from the Western point of view, and U.S.-Hungarian developments in recent months—the return of the Crown of St. Stephen, the paying off of all of Hungary's financial debts to the United States (dating back as far as World War I), the initialing a few days ago of a Long Term Trade Agreement, and we hope soon, the granting of mutual tariff reductions—all augur extremely well for a steady increase in future U.S.-Hungarian trade.

American businessmen should keep in mind that the Eastern European countries are particularly interested in countertrade, that is, in arranging for two-way trade deals like barter, co-production, or joint ventures. If these can be worked out, U.S. exports to East Europe could double or triple their present billion-dollar-a-year level.

THE BUREAU OF EAST-WEST TRADE

The Bureau of East-West Trade was founded in 1972 at the beginning of détente to promote normalization, consistent with national security considerations, of commercial relations between the United States and the communist countries. The Bureau seeks to maximize all the benefits to the United States I have described. We cooperate with many private sector organizations working to expand this trade. They include the East-West Trade Council, the United States Chamber of Commerce (and its business councils with the communist nations of Eastern Europe), the U.S.-U.S.S.R. Trade and Economic Council, the National Council for U.S.-China Trade, the U.S.-G.D.R. Trade and Economic Council, the Committee for East-West Accord, and numerous trade associations.

The programs of the Bureau support the entry of U.S. firms into the communist country markets. We help them deal more easily in these unfamiliar markets. We sponsor American business participation in exhibitions and trade missions in the communist nations. We work directly with communist country officials to enable our businessmen to exploit their opportunities as effectively as possible. Our trade development officers provide business counseling and technical assistance in publications and seminars to answer questions on how to do business with the communist countries. Our economists prepare statistical data and economic information of interest to the business community. The commercial counselors in our embassies in the communist nations; our Moscow, Warsaw, and Vienna offices, and the Department of Commerce Trade Specialists in 43 field offices throughout the United States furnish direct assistance to U.S. firms.

If we are unable to overcome the obstacles to trade with the communist nations, our share of this trade could be even smaller than it is today. We could be deprived of significant economic and other benefits that our Western competitors will gladly absorb. Conversely, if we succeed in smoothing out these trading relationships, American manufactured goods exports to the U.S.S.R., the P.R.C., and Eastern Europe could become four or five times greater in ten years than they are at present.

I have pointed out the imperative I see of pursuing our export markets more vigorously in East-West trade—and the benefits to our economy, to the improvement in our overall relations, and to American business. President Carter wants increased trade, the American people want it, and the American business community wants it.

What can be done?

I offer the following five-point program:

1. Increase U.S. public understanding through expanded dialogue on the important issues of East-West trade.

2. Identify carefully the business opportunities that exist for American firms.

3. Pursue these business opportunities vigorously with the help of the Department of Commerce's Bureau of East-West Trade.

4. Improve the bilateral and multilateral structures so necessary to a sound infrastructure for trade between the United States and these nations.

5. Adopt a national policy of commitment to strengthen this important common interest we share with the communist nations.

Thank you.●

COMMENDATION TO THE UNIVERSITY OF KENTUCKY BASKETBALL TEAM

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, as in legislative session, I send to the desk a resolution commending the University of Kentucky for winning the NCAA basketball championship and ask for its immediate consideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The resolution will be stated by title.

The assistant legislative clerk read as follows:

A RESOLUTION (S. RES. 427) TO COMMEND THE UNIVERSITY OF KENTUCKY BASKETBALL TEAM

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. FORD. Mr. President, 1 week ago today the University of Kentucky's basketball team culminated a brilliant season by defeating Duke University 94–88 in St. Louis for the National Collegiate Athletic Association basketball championship. The victory enabled the Wildcats to finish the season with a 30–2 record—a feat made even more remarkable by the fact that they were ranked at the top of all the polls for the season's duration.

The championship is particularly rewarding to the four seniors on the squad:

Jack Givens, Rick Robey, Mike Phillips, and James Lee. These young men have given 4 years of basketball that will long be remembered as one of the truly great eras of Kentucky basketball history.

As freshmen, they were on a team that finished second to UCLA in the 1975 NCAA final. As sophomores, they led UK to the National Invitational Tournament championship at Madison Square Garden. Last year, they were a finalist in the eastern region.

That is why it was so satisfying to see this group of seniors complete their careers with this crowning achievement. It should also be noted that during the past four seasons, Kentucky won the Southeastern Conference championship three times.

Without a doubt, the man most responsible for this impressive record is Coach Joe B. Hall, who took over as the school's head basketball coach 4 years ago. Not only has he brought the NCAA championship back to Lexington for the first time since 1958, but he remains strongly committed to teaching and motivating young men to succeed in the classroom as well as the basketball floor. He has not—let me repeat not—lost sight of the fact that education is the number one priority for our institutions of higher learning.

Kentucky is fortunate to have an individual of Joe Hall's ability and integrity in this position, and the future for UK's basketball program is indeed bright and promising.

Recognition and messages of congratulation to Coach Hall and his team have come from all over the world. My colleague, Senator HUDDLESTON and I think the Senate, too, should be on record in saluting this impressive accomplishment and we ask unanimous consent that this resolution commending the University of Kentucky basketball team be adopted.

I thank the Chair.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a question of the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. CHURCH. I yield for that purpose.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Kentucky enlighten us? I think this will be helpful to those from other States. What is the secret in Kentucky for producing championship basketball teams? We wish to take that secret home with us.

Mr. FORD. I wish to help Senators as best I can, but I do not think I want to divulge that secret.

It is similar to the situation when the distinguished senior Senator from Arkansas was talking about the game we played. He said he would see me but he would be on the other side of the field. They happen to play this game on a court, and if some of the teams would recognize that maybe it would work out all right.

Let me make one point, if I may, Mr. President, and I do not wish to get everyone off the trend of thought here, but the four seniors on this team and the coach of this team the first year were in the finals of NCAA, the next year they won the NIT, the next year they were in the quarter finals, and this year they won the NCAA championship.

I think that is a pretty good record for a school like the University of Kentucky. As we know, last year they only lost one football game. So maybe we are coming of age. Being an academic institution, the University of Kentucky is one of the top 33 research universities in the country. We are also coming of age in all sports.

I thank the Senator from Idaho and I owe him one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution (S. Res. 427) was agreed to.

The preamble was agreed to.

The resolution, with its preamble, reads as follows:

Whereas, the University of Kentucky's basketball team defeated Duke University on March 27 in St. Louis to win its fifth National Collegiate Athletic Association basketball championship;

Whereas, the senior members of this team, during their four-year varsity career, were also NCAA runners-up, National Invitation Tournament champions and three-time champions of the Southeastern Conference;

Whereas, Coach Joe Hall, his staff and his players displayed outstanding dedication, teamwork and sportsmanship throughout the course of the season in achieving collegiate basketball's highest honor;

Whereas, Coach Hall and the Wildcats have brought pride and honor to the Commonwealth which is rightly known as the basketball capital of the world;

Therefore, be it resolved that the Senate of the United States commend and congratulate the University on this outstanding accomplishment.

SEC. 2. The Secretary of the Senate is hereby directed to transmit a copy of this resolution to the University of Kentucky.

WEAKNESS OF ADMINISTRATION'S DEFENSE BUDGET

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, examination of the 1979 defense budget, now the subject of hearings in Congress, reveals a dangerous shift in U.S. defense policy.

We are being asked to approved a sharply reduced defense budget which erodes strategic weapons development and sea power and unmasks an administration policy of reductions and risk.

The $126 billion requested for defense in fiscal year 1979 is $8.4 billion below that projected by the previous administration. Combined with the cut in defense last year the 2-year Carter defense funding program is now $15 billion below that projected by President Ford.

EVEN MODEST HIKE FALLS SHORT

Further, the current administration has failed to even request its modestly projected 3-percent growth in the fiscal year 1979 defense budget. The actual growth being sought by the administration is only 1.8 percent, and represents a relatively insignificant money increase of $2.3 billion in constant dollars.

This reduced level of funding is taking place in a period when practically every expert is alarmed about the huge buildup of Soviet strategic and conventional forces. Even administration spokesmen admit this accelerated military effort goes far beyond that necessary to insure the security of the Soviet Union.

SHIFT IN PRIORITIES

Mr. President, this buildup includes significant shifts in priorities. For instance, while Defense gets a 1.8-percent increase, the budget of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare is increased by $22.7 billion, a hike of over 14 percent from fiscal year 1978.

Two other Federal departments also will receive sharp boosts. The Department of Labor budget is to receive a 44-percent increase to $29.9 billion and the Department of Transportation a 38-percent boost to $17.4 billion.

While money can be found for the above cited Departments, the President has vigorously attacked the weapons procurement portion of the defense budget almost from the beginning of his administration.

In just 1 year over $12 billion has been removed from the procurement appropriations scheduled during the fiscal years 1977–79 period.

And, this is just the beginning. Current projections by the administration project a 5-year Defense Department program over the fiscal years 1978–82 period of $33 billion below that planned by President Ford.

These cutbacks are most identifiable and damaging in three significant areas: Strategic programs, Navy programs, and Army training.

STRATEGIC PROGRAMS

In the past few years, the United States was well on its way to total renovation of its strategic triad of weapon systems in response to the rapidly accelerating Soviet threat. We were moving from the B–52 to the B–1, from Minuteman missiles to MX missiles, from Polaris-Poseidon to Trident.

The more than a decade of efforts and $5 billion in expenditures had resulted in a B–1 aircraft designed to replace our aging B–52 bomber fleet.

Suddenly last year the President decided against the B–1 on the grounds we could rely on the 20-year-old B–52 with a yet to be tested standoff cruise missile.

The second leg of the triad, the Minuteman missiles, were to be updated with the new MX. This was necessary because the fixed sites of the Minuteman would become vulnerable to Soviet attack in the early or mid-1980's.

MX PROGRAM SHARPLY CUT

Budget planning called for MX development expenditures of $294 million in fiscal year 1978 and $1.5 billion in fiscal year 1979. But the new administration sharply cut this program to $134 million in fiscal year 1978 and to $158 million in fiscal year 1979. This $1.5 billion cut in MX spending entails serious risks for the United States.

This reduction of the mobile missile effort not only delays by 2 to 3 years U.S. deployment of the MX—from 1985 to 1987—it lengthens the period when our Minuteman will be vulnerable to Soviet attack.

TRIDENT PROGRAM

The third leg of the triad, the missile submarine has so far survived attack by the new administration. Support for the Trident submarines were not cut and construction continues on the first of these new boats. However, delays in construction will mean the Trident will be deployed later than expected. Depending upon the retirement time of our current missile subs, this could mean a smaller sea-based deterrent during the mid-1980's just when Minuteman III is most vulnerable.

Mr. President, it is obvious the United States is reducing too much in the strategic areas and assuming too many risks with the security of this Nation and her people.

NAVY PROGRAMS

Moving now to the huge Navy cuts in the defense budget we find that the shipbuilding program has been cut from 29 to 15 vessels. This reduction amounts to 14 less ships than were planned just 1 year ago for fiscal year 1979 by the Ford administration.

The Carter administration has also severely reduced the planned 158 ship and $48 billion 5-year plan for fiscal years 1978 through 1982. Instead of 158 ships only 101 ships are now scheduled, a drastic blow to our Navy which is already at unacceptably low levels.

These actions are being taken despite the huge buildup of the Soviet Navy and warnings from independent defense analysts that the U.S. Navy is already in many respects falling behind the Soviet fleet.

ARMY MANPOWER

Another cutback in the defense budget is the sharp reduction in Army training forces recommended by the administration.

Army training strength is being trimmed by about 12,000 between the 1978 and 1979 fiscal year without congressional approval. This action follows a recommendation by the liberal Brookings Institution which President Carter incorporated into his 1976 campaign. In fact, many of the Brookings personnel have now moved into the Defense Department to carry out their proposals.

Although the Congress set Army manpower at 787,000 last year, it is being arbitrarily reduced by the Defense Department without congressional concurrence in an effort to get down toward the lower figure of 772,000 recommended in the budget for fiscal year 1979. Congress has not approved this lower manning level but DOD is moving toward it nevertheless.

Severely reduced training personnel funds will surely have an adverse effect on combat readiness of our ground forces, thus weakening our defense credibility even further.

Mr. President, while these policies weaken our defense forces, the Soviets are deploying a new family of intercontinental missiles and a killer satellite. These developments are leading to a dangerous shift in the balance of power which cannot be corrected overnight.

In summary, here is what is taking place:

First. Shifting of priorities from defense to other agencies.

Second. Sharp reductions in overall defense spending.

Third. Termination of the B–1 program.

Fourth. Slowdown of the MX mobile missile program.

Fifth. Reductions of 50 percent in Navy ship requests for 1979.

Sixth. Arbitrary cuts in Army training manpower levels.

Mr. President, this is a policy of risk and reductions. Fortunately the congressional defense committees are recommending an addition to the defense budgets of $2 billion this year.

However, the "massive Soviet buildup" which the President finally acknowledged in his North Carolina defense speech cannot be met with the level of spending in his current defense budget nor in his 5-year defense plan.

Rather than meeting this threat the administration had planned to accept an unfavorable agreement in the strategic arms limitation talks until Congress sent a clear message to the White House.

It appears the new administration is turning its cheek to the insults from the Soviets all over the world. This policy of idealism must be abandoned if we are to prevent wars in the future. Strength in our defense posture will prevent wars, weakness invites wars. I trust the new administration will learn this lesson before the damage to our national defense posture becomes more severe.

U.S. POSITION AT SALT II

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, a thorough and perceptive article on SALT II appeared in the January 1978 issue of Air Force magazine.

Written by senior editor Edgar Ulsamer, this article examines all elements of the current U.S. strategic posture and the ramifications of SALT II.

I ask unanimous consent that this article, entitled "The Equal Sign in the SALT II Equation" be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE EQUAL SIGN IN THE SALT II EQUATION

(By Edgar Ulsamer, senior editor)

When Secretary of State Cyrus Vance last fall briefed a select group of US senators on the status of SALT II, Sen. Henry (Scoop) Jackson (D-Wash.) reportedly reacted with undisguised irritation and frustration. Senator Jackson, a forceful, apperceptive critic of negotiating errors that in earlier rounds of the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks led to loopholes and asymmetries, putatively bristled at the apparent absence of coherent US policy approaches and at the concessions—not briefed to the appropriate Senate subcommittee—that occurred after the Carter Administration first went to the mat with Moscow's SALT II negotiators early in 1977.

At this writing, the bottom line on SALT II is still hazy, but most of the pivotal features of this pending accord that will vitally influence the strategic posture of the two superpowers in the next decade and beyond, are becoming discernible. Capitol Hill SALT watchers guardedly predict that the agreement will be concluded before May 1978.

The proposed SALT terms are being aired publicly—to the obvious chagrin of the Administration—through volleys of news leaks and counterleaks. Gag orders, concerning direct discussion of SALT-related matters with Congress, issued to the Defense Department and other government agencies, have slowed but not shut off the leaks.

Rep. Robin Beard (R-Tenn.), a member of the House Armed Services Committee and Chairman of the House Republican Task Force on National Defense, charged the Carter Administration with attempting to suppress independent and critical assessments of the Administration's SALT II proposals. Beard released the text of an Administration memorandum, signed by David Aaron, Deputy Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs, to the Departments of State and Defense as well as the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, the Central Intelligence Agency, and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. This White House order requested that any information to be provided to Congress on the strategic forces and programs of the US and the USSR "should be cleared through the SALT Working Group" to assure that such analyses are "consistent with and represent the best judgment of the Executive Branch." The underlying objective, according to Beard, is "to stifle independent and objective assessments of the . . . SALT II proposal and prevent Congress from gaining access to any dissenting viewpoints."

At the same time, five Senators considered proponents of the Carter Administration's SALT approach launched a counteroffensive to change the makeup of the Senate's Arms Control Subcommittee Sen. Gary Hart (D-Colo.) even called a special news conference to denounce unnamed malefactors "who oppose a SALT II treaty agreement—and possibly any realistic arms limitation treaty [and who] have rushed to judgment, to reveal and condemn a treaty still being fashioned."

Meanwhile, congressional sources report increasing Administration pressure via the "pork barrel sector" on members suspected of fostering opposition to the present terms of SALT II. White House concern is understandable; at least the core element of SALT II—the basic treaty that is to be in effect for eight years—requires Senate approval by a two-thirds majority. At this writing, opponents of the SALT II terms claim their informal polling suggests that "at least between thirty-five and forty nay votes" can be expected. It would take only thirty-four nays to reject such an accord.

Press coverage of SALT's terms, in spite of extensive public relations campaigns by the White House and other government departments concerned with SALT, has often been critical. Typical of the reaction among newspapers of generally conservative persuasion was this lead of a Chicago Tribune commentary: "The best thing that can be said about the proposed SALT agreement slowly emerging in Geneva is that it tilts so outrageously in favor of the Soviet Union as virtually to defy the Senate to ratify it." The fact that congressional action on the Panama Canal treaties, another cliff hanger, could well overlap with Senate action on SALT II, provides little comfort to the supporters of the latter. Two other Carter Administration initiatives in the disarmament field also might affect the congresional climate at the time: the so-called Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty (CTB) eliminating all nuclear testing—considered by most technical experts as essentially unverifiable—and a ban equally difficult to monitor and enforce on the test, development, and deployment of chemical warfare weapons.

Whether these basically adverse political factors—coupled with reportedly increasing Soviet recalcitrance concerning certain unresolved or "gray" issues—will cause the Administration to toughen its stance is problematical. What seems certain is that SALT II will undergo further, drawn-out modification. The case for revision—despite obvious

U.S. eagerness to fill the vacuum brought about when the SALT I five-year interim accord expired last October—becomes formidable through such public statements as Rep. Jack Kemp's (R-N.Y.) comment that "I am appalled at the extent of the collapse of our SALT negotiating posture. We are headed for an agreement which will increase the risk of nuclear war and codify Soviet strategic nuclear superiority with the unmeasurable consequences for our diplomacy such a condition implies. . . . The Congress willl not ratify such a one-sided agreement, and I will make every effort to see that SALT II is not ratified until its terms are modified to provide for equality for the United States."

Perhaps even more significant was a recent letter to President Carter by three Democratic senators—all members of the Armed Services Committee and considered staunch supporters of strategic arms limitations. Sens. Thomas J. McIntyre (D-N.H.), John C. Culver (D-Iowa), and Dale Bumpers (D-Ark.), importuned the White House to take a stiffer stance and insist on more precise SALT II language to protect vital U.S. interests. The letter listed six specific treaty areas in need of shoring up "to strengthen the agreement and to broaden support for ratification."

THE SALT II OUTLINE

Possibly the most telling blow was struck by Paul Nitze, a former SALT negotiator and a Deputy Secretary of Defense in the Johnson Administration. The picture of SALT II's consequences drawn by Mr. Nitze for the news media—subsequently confirmed in terms of broad facts but not in implication by a senior defense official—is that "in prompt countermilitary potential residing in ICBMs the present approximate state of parity will degrade to a better than ten-to-one advantage for the Soviet Union by 1985; that by that year the Soviets will have achieved numerical parity with the US in warheads; that by 1985 the Soviet lead in total megatonnage over the US will be slightly more than six to one"; and that recent U.S. program decisions plus the terms of the probable SALT agreement make it virtually impossible "to maintain crisis stability, rough equivalence, or to reverse the presently unfavorable trends during the period of the agreements. . . . We are," said Mr. Nitze, "locked into inferiority, and I don't know how to get out of it."

SALT II, as presently structured, is to consist of a treaty, a Protocol, and a Statement of Principles that spells out the major issues to be dealt with in SALT III.

The actual treaty, Mr. Nitze and several congressmen, including Representatives Beard and Kemp, told the press, is likely to become retroactive to the expiration of the SALT I Interim Agreement last fall and, initially, is to limit both sides to an aggregate of 2,400 strategic nuclear launch vehicles (SNLVs), consisting of ICBM and SLBM launchers and heavy bombers. This limit was arrived at in the 1974 Vladivostok understanding. The initially authorized total is to be reduced to an extent and over a period of time that are still not firmly decided. The US proposed a reduction to about 2,160 by 1980 while the Soviets are holding out for an aggregate of 2,250 by 1982.

A sublimit of 1,320 MIRVed weapons—also carried forward from Vladivostok—is to become effective at once but now it includes heavy bombers carrying armed air-launched cruise missiles of intermediate range. ICBMs were defined in Geneva as systems with a range of 5,500 kilometers or more but no definition was reached on SLBMs. A further subcategory—within the MIRVed weapons—was created but specific numbers apepar to be still under negotiation: The US proposed a maximum combined total of MIRVed ICBM and SLBM launchers of 1,200, whereas the Soviet ceiling was 1,250. Of this total no more than 820 may be MIRVed ICBMs. The Soviets will be permitted to have 326 (or 308, if operational launchers at test ranges are not counted) modern large ballistic missiles (MLBMs) of the SS–18 type. That missile's throw-weight exceeds that of the older SS–9—which US negotiators in 1972 erroneously assumed to represent the maximum permitted throw-weight—by about 4,000 pounds. The remaining MIRVed Soviet ICBMs can be SS–17s and SS–19s, whose throw-weights are 7,000 pounds and 8,000 pounds, respectively. The US is not permitted any MLBMs at all.

The fate of USAF's proposed MX missile—with a throw-weight of 7,500 pounds, or slightly less than that of the SS–19—could be adversely affected by SALT II. The reason is that the provisions governing "new" ICBMs, including mobile or unconventionally based systems, are not yet firm. According to Mr. Nitze, the US proposed that during the initial three years of the treaty—the so-called Protocol period—there be no testing of ICBM types not previously tested, and no deployment of types not already deployed at the time the agreement is signed.

Yte another sticking point, congressional sources told AIR FORCE Magazine, is precise definition of what is a "new" and what is a "modified" ICBM. With the Soviets known to have at least five ICBMs, including the mobile SS–16, ready either to join the operational inventory or to enter or continue operational testing, this question becomes crucial. Complicating the definition problem is the tendency of ICBM designers—especially in the Soviet Union—to incorporate proven components in new weapons. Hence the ambiguity inherent in the question of when is a "new" ICBM new in the sense of the treaty.

The Soviet position to date appears to be that the ban should be confined to new NIRVed ICBMs, thus permitting the testing and deployment of any new system, fixed-site or mobile, as long as it carries only a single RV. The implied potential for "breakout," i.e., rapid conversion to MIRVed configuration in case of termination or abrogation of SALT, is conspicuous. So is the problem of verifying whether such weapons indeed remain un-MIRVed.

After the expiration of the Protocol, the treaty language would seem to permit the development, testing, and deployment of mobile or unconventionally based systems. They would, of course, be counted within applicable numerical limits.

Both sides apparently agree that mobile systems and mobile launchers can be tested—but not deployed—during the three-year life of the Protocol, as long as the missile is not actually test-fired from such a launcher. This provision would not seem to shackle the MX program because that system could not be ready for full testing until after the expiration of the Protocol.

OTHER ICBM RESTRICTIONS

Ballistic missiles with a throw-weight greater than that of the SS–18 will be prohibited and all those exceeding the throw-weight of the SS–19—presumably as stipulated by the US since the Soviets refuse to divulge such information—will be counted as MLBMs. The ambiguities that arise from such unilateral defintions would seem to portend rough sledding in the Senate for these provisions. Even under the best of circumstances—and assuming punctilious Soviet adherence to such basically unverifiable commitments as to forego MIRVing of single RV systems and not to seek a silo reload capability—the throw-weight chasm can be expected to widen significantly under SALT II. Mr. Nitze estimated that by 1985 the Soviet throw-weight aggregate residing in their ICBMs will approach 8,000,000 pounds, which would translate into about 5,000 RVs, each with a yield several times that of the US warheads. US throw-weight, he predicted, will be 1,250,000 pounds, assuming that the number of Minuteman III remains at 550 and is not reduced—as is likely—to accommodate additional heavy bombers and SLBMs.

The consequences of this throw-weight imbalance, when coupled with normal, evolutionary improvements in Soviet warhead accuracy, could be decisive. Congressman Kemp calculates that under the terms of the tentatively approved SALT II Joint Draft Text, the Soviets could develop a capability to destroy up to 4,331 US targets with a blast resistance of 1,000 pounds per square inch, the approximate hardness of some Minuteman silos. "This figure is four times the number of such targets in the United States [hence the US] has agreed to terms that not only eliminate the Minuteman ICBM system as a viable element of our deterrent in the 1980's, but also undermine [the Administration's] plan to use 747-type aircraft to carry cruise missiles, because these aircraft can only use 150 bases, or less, in the entire US because of the great weight of the aircraft."

Mr. Nitze suggested that once Soviet accuracy approaches 0.15 miles, about ninety percent of the US ICBM silos could be destroyed if the Soviets target two RVs on each silo. Such an attack would draw down the Soviet ICBM force by "less than half of the MIRVed ICBM RVs they are expected to have available by 1985. If and when their accuracy approximates a tenth of a mile, around ninety percent of our silos would be vulnerable to an attack by a single RV against each silo, provided that additional RVs are programmed to substitute for missiles that fail during their launch phase." If, on the other hand, the US were to launch all 550 Minuteman IIIs against Soviet silos and "assuming improved accuracy and the substitution of MK-12A for MK-12 RVs, . . . it is unlikely that we could destroy more than sixty percent of them," Mr. Nitze estimated.

A senior Defense official did not deny the basic accuracy of Mr. Nitze's contentions. He did challenge, however, the importance that SALT II opponents ascribe to narrow comparisons of Soviet vs. US MIRVed ICBMs, without regard to the capabilities inherent in the other components of the strategic Triad. Saving ICBMs per se should not be a sine qua non of SALT II. in the Administration's view. Rather, he said, the US objective is to reach terms that permit the US—if necessary—as much payload, as much hard-target kill capability, and as effective a deterrent capability as that of the Soviets. The means for retaining relative balance are to be the air-launched cruise missiles (ALCM) and SLBMs, according to the Defense Department. ALCM's accuracy and range allegedly will be sufficient to destroy Soviet ICBM silos if they are being reloaded with spare missiles in violation of the agreement, the senior Defense official said. Congressional experts on strategic warfare are skeptical about the practicality of such an approach.

CURBS ON SLBMS AND BOMBERS

It is likely that the SLBM balance will continue to slightly favor the U.S. There is also evidence that the U.S. leads in the ability to detect submerged submarines although eventual advances in Soviet countermeasure technology might negate this U.S. advantage. Whether or not SLBMs can redress the pronounced asymmetry in ICBMs expected in the 1980s is debatable. Neither the Defense Department nor the SALT II opposition expects SLBMs to achieve significant hard-target kill capabilities within the lifespan of SALT II. The prospect of solving the command and control problem of the Fleet Ballistic Missile force remains dim, in the view of most technical experts. Some defense analysts believe, therefore, that the role assigned to strategic submarines may have to be modified by curtailing their patrol area or using them as a highly survivable strategic reserve, instead of as part of the cutting edge of strategic deterrence.

At this writing, it appears that the Soviets will be authorized about 400 MIRVed SLBMs, assuming that they deploy their quota of 820 MIRVed ICBMs. Neither SALT II nor the three-year Protocol appears to place specific restrictions on deployment of the new Trident submarine or its Soviet counterpart, the twenty to twenty-four launch-type TYPHOON.

The U.S. appears to be handicapped somewhat, however, because the new Soviet SSNX-18 SLBM, thought to have a range close to 6,000 miles, came in under the wire, whereas the U.S. Navy's proposed Trident II SLBM of equal range did not. Trident I can be tested and deployed, but its range of about 4,000 miles does not permit launch from home ports against Soviet targets.

Some terms affecting heavy bombers and cruise missiles are still fluid at this writing. It seems certain, however, that the Soviet Backfire strategic bomber, contrary—according to Representative Beard—to the Joint Chiefs of Staff recommendation, will not be covered by SALT II. Neither apparently will the ninety to 100 heavy Soviet bombers—with bomb bays intact—that have been modified for reconnaissance and antisubmarine warfare missions. SALT II critics report that the Backfire's exemption came about through Soviet willingness to declare, informally and outside the treaty language, that the weapon would not be used in a fashion threatening the United States and that the present production rate would not be increased. There appears to be a colossal catch, however: The Soviets, for reasons known only to themselves, refuse to say what that rate is.

As yet unresolved is the question of whether or not US B–52s in protective storage will count against the SALT limit, unless, of course, they are destroyed voluntarily. At this writing, Administration witnesses are briefing Congress on what is billed as a major, last-minute Soviet concession concerning cruise missiles. A SALT II sticking point, heretofore, had been definition of cruise missile range. These low-flying, subsonic weapons obviously are affected by wind and other environmental factors as well as being vulnerable to Soviet air defenses and, therefore, must be programmed to fly around SAM concentrations. Thus, in typical scenarios they will cover about twenty-five percent more distance than the straight-line from launch points to targets. Reportedly, the Soviets have agreed now to define range in light of practical conditions. During the life of the three-year Protocol, test and deployment of cruise missiles with a range of more than 2,500 kilometers is forbidden. By implication, the door is left open to increase that range once the Protocol expires in case changes in Soviet air defenses make it necessary. SALT II critics view this approach with apprehension if not alarm for a number of reasons.

The Joint Chiefs reportedly opposed from the outset initial range restrictions of ALCM to below 3,000 kilometers, and to below 3,500 kilometers following the expiration of the three-year Protocol. Grounds, presumably, were the need to reach the Soviet target complex along the Transsiberian railroad from standoff position in the face of steady outward expansion of Soviet air defense capabilities. Recent intelligence analyses suggest convincingly that Soviet technology will soon permit moving the air defense perimeter much farther out to sea, possibly up to 1,900 kilometers. Such a development, obviously, would relegate first-generation cruise missiles launched from nonpenetrating platforms to a state of uselessness, especially if linked to massive Soviet deployment of the seven- to fifteen-mile-range, low-altitude Soviet SA-X-10 surface-to-air missile system.

Historical experience supports the argument that ground yielded in agreements with the Soviets is next to impossible to regain. The Administration's plan to extend ALCM's range after expiration of the Protocol—if so required—can be seen as doubly weak since the Soviet Union will not be required to reduce the aggregate of its nuclear delivery vehicles until that very time. As Mr. Nitze asked rhetorically: "Is it inconceivable that in the event we do not wish to renew certain provisions of the Protocol when it expires the Soviets might see some necessity to review the treaty terms?"

Critics of pertinent SALT II formulations see another catch in connection with air-launched cruise missiles. These intermediate-range weapons, contrary to some portrayals, are not independent from their launching platform. The viability of the bomber/cruise missile system depends on a number of factors: The prelaunch survivability of the bombers; sufficient hardness of the bombers to survive enemy barrage bombing of their escape routes; the ability of the bombers to penetrate close enough to the target without getting shot down; the ability to launch enough ALCMs to overload the defenses; and, lastly, the capacity of the cruise missile to penetrate area and terminal defenses and to strike the target with enough accuracy to destroy it. With the B–1 canceled, the proposed FB–111H program scuttled by Congress before it got off the ground, and the Backfire getting a free ride from Salt II, the cruise missile equation takes on a totally new meaning. On the strength of the Administration's SALT proposals for sublimits within the 1,320 MIRVed weapons ceiling, it is being assumed that the U.S. plans to equip about 120 B–52s with ALCMs.

As Mr. Nitze argued convincingly, it would be unlikely that more than about fifty percent of the B–52s would be on continuous alert or that more than about seventy percent could be maintained at full readiness during crisis periods requiring fully-generated strategic forces. From the Soviet perspective, the picture looks considerably brighter. There are no U.S. air defenses to speak of, and the Backfire arsenal can be proliferated with impunity. (Even conservative CIA estimates foresee a force of 400 of these advanced strategic bombers.) If this assumption is correct, two conditions would obtain that threaten to negate U.S. plans for maintaining strategic stability: The Soviet Union, within the next few years, would be able to deliver substantially more megatonnage on the U.S. with its bomber force than this country could bring to bear on the USSR, and the component of the U.S. strategic forces counted on to offset the Soviet lead in ICBMs—the bomber/cruise missile system—turns out to be in a deficit position itself. Hence this dire warning by Mr. Nitze: "Under the now most likely provisions of a SALT II agreement we run a high risk of having no B–1, cruise missiles adequate in numbers and range to penetrate Soviet defenses, no follow-on to the aging Minuteman III, and an SLBM force at sea of [fewer] than twenty-five boats, each constituting four percent of our only reliable deterrent power and thus worth enormous Soviet effort to negate."

SINGLING OUT THEATER WEAPONS

Another late Soviet concession, seen as major by SALT II supporters, is the agreement to permit testing ground-launched (GLCM) and sea-launched (SLCM) cruise missles over a distance of up to 2,500 kilometers from ground-based launchers. This "concession" does not seem to affect in any way, however, the prohibition of deploying such weapons with a range greater than 600 kilometers. The fact that these theater weapons are an element of SALT II is curious of itself. The Soviet SS–20, a new MIRVed mobile, intermediate ballistic missle with a range of well over 4,000 kilometers, is not counted under SALT II rules, even though its erectors/launchers can accommodate the clearly intercontinental SS–16 from which it differs only by deletion of one of the latter's three stages. Ditto for the Backfire, portrayed by the Soviets as a theater weapon, despite its dual capability due to its intercontinental range. There is little doubt among congressional experts on NATO, and US and European NATO commanders and analysts, that a 600-kilometer ground-launched cruise missile is not cost-effective and will not be built. Pershing II's present range exceeds the proposed GLCM limit and could be extended to about 2,500 kilometers without degrading the weapon's high accuracy, and without being hamstrung by SALT II, congressional analysts point out.

GLCM/SLCM weapons are embroiled in another SALT II dispute, the so-called noncircumvention and nontransfer clauses covering technologies of potentially strategic utility. The Soviet contention is that US transfer of such technologies to its allies—in the main satellite-derived terrain data used to keep cruise missiles on course, and high-energy fuel technology—could lead to a circumvention of SALT because one or more NATO powers could build GLCMs with a range greater than 600 kilometers. U.S. willingness to entertain Soviet requests to shut out US allies has caused a rift between this nation and its European allies. As a prominent congressional source told Air Force Magazine, "The notion that we tell our allies. 'No, we can't give you the information needed to help offset the widening Warsaw Pact lead because we have made common cause with our mutual adversary,' boggles the mind."

THE VERIFICATION PROBLEM

SALT II critics uniformly view the lack of verification—beginning with the Soviet refusal to disclose essential information about their strategic capabilities, including numbers and performance characteristics—as a potentially fatal flaw of SALT II as it stands today. Even under the best of circumstances, compliance with SALT terms is difficult to verify. Vertification becomes impossible if what is to be limited and the nature of the limitation have not been clearly defined. "How do you determine," Mr. Nitze and other critics have asked, "that a new missile having the throw-weight of an SS–19 and carrying the SS–19 bus, but with a single RV, is not capable of being deployed as a MIRVed missile? How do you determine that retired missiles, or missiles taken out of retired launchers or extra produced missiles are not stock-piled and available for relatively prompt deployment on soft pads or reloaded in launchers using the cold-launch technique."

This late in the SALT game it is not likely that the fundamental tone of the pending agreement can be changed. The near-mystic belief that any arms accord is better than none linked to the notion that nuclear war is unthinkable and strategic asymmetries therefore inconsequential, have provided SALT with an unstoppable momentum. Even the most vocal critics of SALT are resigned to its inevitability. Most of them are resolved—if the accord is ratified by the Senate—to concentrate efforts on assuring that all the steps permitted the US in maintaining perceived essential equivalence in the future will indeed be taken. There is consensus that the first and most crucial step here must be MX, the system that Representative Beard predicts would demonstrate to the Soviets "the folly of an arms race [thus causing them] to accept an equitable SALT agreement which would contribute to long-term strategic stability and world peace."

NATIONALIZING RAILROAD RIGHTS-OF-WAY

Mr. McGOVERN. Mr. President, the two recent railroad disasters in Florida and Tennessee which took at least 20 lives have starkly brought to the public's attention the deplorable conditions of our Nation's railbeds. The condition of the rails and railbeds are a threat to both lives and freight.

There has been considerable discussion in recent years about what to do about the condition of the railbeds. Some of the possible public policy alternatives were clearly explained in a recent article in Business Week in the March 27, 1978, issue.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the article "Talk of Nationalizing Railroad Rights-of-Way" in the March 27, 1978, issue of Business Week be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TALKS OF NATIONALIZING RAILROAD RIGHTS-OF-WAY

Two railroad disasters in recent weeks took at least 20 lives in Florida and Tennessee and are raising an issue that the railroad industry had hoped never to face—the nationalization of the rights-of-way U.S. railroads. Governor Ray Blanton of Tennessee, where 12 persons were killed following the derailment of a Louisville & Nashville RR freight train at Waverly, has publicly called for such nationalization so that railroad roadbeds could be rehabilitated.

Ironically, neither the Tennessee accident nor the second one in Youngstown, Fla., in which lethal chlorine gas was discharged from a ruptured tank car, were found to have been caused by poor track conditions. Still, the percentage of train accidents caused by badly maintained track has been rising steadily for several years. In 1973, some 48 percent of 7,389 derailments were caused by track problems. In 1976, fully 55 percent of 7,700 derailments were caused by bad tracks.

MAINTENANCE

The railroad industry, with an average return on invested capital of less than 2 percent, has been hard pressed to maintain its plant and equipment. Nevertheless, during a period when their earnings have been the lowest since before World War II, railroads have put as much money as they could scrape up into roadbed maintenance. Last year they spent $3.3 billion for such maintenance, up 50 percent since 1975. In each of the past two years, they laid 27 million new ties and more than 800,000 tons of new rail—each a 20-year record.

Despite these efforts, about 12 percent of the nearly 320,000 mi. of track in the country is still not in proper condition. This large amount of potentially unsafe track leads some public officials—and, for the first time, some in the railroad industry—to consider the merits of public takeover of the rights-of-way. At present, the only rail officials who publicly support such a move are those from the weakest railroads. "Solvency tends to insulate you from this problem," says Alan G. Dustin, president of Boston & Maine Corp., already in Section 77 bankruptcy reorganization.

Even Dustin does not come to his views happily. "If I thought we could survive in a completely free-enterprise environment, I would prefer it," he says. "But I don't, and given the choice of nationalizing the whole thing or just from the wheels down, I'd prefer the latter."

Worthington L. Smith, president of the bankrupt Milwaukee Road, echoes Dustin. "There is no conceivable way for an industry that returns less than 2 percent to generate internally enough money to rehabilitate, maintain, and also invest in needed new facilities," he states. Railroads, he says, are being treated as public utilities—denied the right of exit from parts of the business, yet also denied the opportunity to replenish their capital.

INDIRECT SUBSIDIES

The railroad industry argues that if its competitors—trucks and barges—had to pay their fair share for the rights-of-way provided for them by the federal government, then railroads would have pricing flexibility and would attract additional traffic, generating enough new revenues to maintain their plant. The Association of American Railroads claims that these indirect subsidies to truckers and barge lines deprive the railroads of more than $2 billion a year in revenues.

Truckers and barge lines, of course, vigorously deny that they receive any unfair subsidies. The real question here is whether Congress will be inclined to increase highway and waterway user charges—and, as a result, freight bills. Pending legislation would impose a charge on inland waterway users for the first time, but even that would not come close to full recovery of public expenditures on the waterways. And no one in Congress at the present time is thinking of increasing highway-user charges.

Faced with the likelihood that they will not gain competitive equity by having their competitors taxed, railroads will need to find another way to come up with the money to repair and rebuild their tracks. Congress may be willing to provide an offsetting subsidy to the railroads, and even though it may not be good economics—offsetting subsidies lead only to duplication of facilities—it could be good politics. A railroad subsidy would not raise anyone's freight bill.

One subsidy approach, proposed in the past and revived this year by Senator H. John Heinz III (R-Pa.), would provide federal funds to hire unemployed workers to perform track work. But such a proposal does not deal with the problem identified by Dustin, Smith, and others—the railroads' investment in their fixed plant. Their variable costs—the controllable portion of costs—now are only about 25% of total costs. "If we could be relieved of the investment in the fixed plant," says Smith, "we would be freed to invest for market opportunities and growth opportunities."

SHIFTING THE BURDEN

Those who favor public ownership of the track see benefits in such a move. By shifting the maintenance burden from fixed charges to variable costs and including some public subsidy, they reason, railroads would be able to concentrate on being service-oriented carriers. "Economics would dictate that you could lower rates," Dustin points out, citing the current 26% of revenues that railroads spend on rights-of-way compared with the mere 5% of revenues that truckers pay in highway-user charges. "I marvel at the profitability of some trucking companies," Smith says. "They invest only in service."

The most likely method of public takeover of the roadbeds would be for the government to buy the tracks, with the railroads paying a user charge based on the gross tonnage they run over the lines. As long as the charge does not cover the full cost of maintaining those lines, the railroads get a subsidy. But the subsidy would be rather neatly hidden, because the public expenditure would go into public property. And Congress would then not have to deal with the thorny issue of writing subsidy checks to some still-wealthy railroads such as the Union Pacific RR or Southern Ry. Co. In this way, railroads would achieve parity at the public trough with their competitors, which have long had the use of publicly provided rights-of-way.

Those who favor such a step would deal with underlying mortgages and bondholders in a variety of ways. A government corporation that owns the fixed plant could assume existing liabilities and continue to pay them off, reducing the amount of up-front money needed for a buy-out. Dustin suggests that if a railroad sells its plant for half its value in cash, the government would be justified in giving the road a perpetual license to operate over the track. The railroad would then have enough cash or earning power to continue to pay its bondholders.

DANGERS

Most of the railroad industry still opposes the public-takeover concept. William J. McDonald, senior vice-president for law at Union Pacific Corp., says, "It is too early to reach a conclusion on the grim scenario" that the industry will be unable to generate the funds to maintain and rehabilitate its plant. He also cites a number of dangers:

Retaining all existing track whether it is needed or not.

Loss of tax revenues to state and local governments.

Political pressures to upgrade light-density track rather than to abandon it.

The creation of a new federal bureaucracy to handle maintenance.

A big concern in the industry is the possibility that once the rights-of-way are nationalized, they might be used the way public highways are. Big shippers could decide to run their own trains, and special-purpose carriers could enter the market in order to move high-volume commodities such as coal, ore, and grain. "This would be cream-skimming," McDonald claims, "and you would be leaving the common carriage obligation where it is today—on the shoulders of the railroad industry."

While the idea of public takeover draws support only from a minority of hard-pressed railroad officials and such public bodies as the New England Regional Commission, there can be little doubt that sentiment for such a step will grow if derailments caused by bad track are not reduced. And unless the railroads can find the cash to rebuild their tracks, they may ultimately turn to the federal government themselves.

SO-CALLED "LABOR REFORM" BILL UNMASKED BY NORTH CAROLINA EDITORS

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, in recent weeks there have been assertions by the proponents of the so-called labor reform bill (S. 2467) that the only opposition to the bill is coming from big business and professional right wing groups. Nothing, of course, could be further from the truth. In my own State, for instance, dozens of newspapers of all sizes and political philosophies have come out in opposition to this bill.

The common theme running through the various editorials appearing in North Carolina papers is that the legislation is not "reform" at all. "Reform" is a carefully selected euphemism to cover the bill's true purposes. Fortunately, the cover is too thin to fool anyone. As one North Carolina editor put it in the Greensboro Record:

> The only known beneficiaries of the proposed revision in the National Labor Relations Act will be the big labor bosses and the machine politicians they carry about in their pockets. The working stiff stands to lose yet another measure of his individual liberty, and the Sunbelt region—especially in the Carolinas, with their labor-intensive but unorganized industrial shops—stands to suffer a massive assault on its economy.

What is really going on is not difficult to perceive. As another North Carolina editor stated in the Morganton (N.C.) News-Herald:

> The fact that the bill has gotten as far as it has is an illustration of the power that George Meany and his colleagues have amassed in Washington through lobbying and generous campaign support. Because if our elected servants in the capital were reflecting the wishes of their constituents, the proposal wouldn't have a chance.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a sampling of North Carolina editorial opinion on the so-called labor reform bill be printed at this point in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Durham Morning Herald, Feb. 4, 1978]

REFORM IT ISN'T

Americans who are concerned about the fundamental rights of employees and employers should want to express opposition to the so-called labor law "reform" bill that labor leaders hope will come to a Senate vote before Feb. 13.

When the rhetoric is cleared away and when the arguments on both sides are weighed, the primary purpose of the proposed "reforms" is to assist labor in organizing workers and in promoting compulsory union membership at a time when labor finds itself representing an ever-declining proportion of the nation's work force.

Just how badly union organizers need Senate Bill 1883 is made evident by the facts of sharply declining union membership. Private sector unions suffered a net loss of 866,000 due-paying members between 1974 and 1976. Union members now make up only 20.1 percent of the total labor force in this nation—down from about 25 percent in 1955.

The labor reform bill is interpreted as a device through which workers' individual rights would be surrendered to enhance the slipping power of unions. Because of the threat of severe penalties which the bill would introduce, the typical employer would knuckle under and sign a union agreement, almost regardless of what union negotiators demanded. And practically each time a union agreement is reached, labor spokesmen insist that all employees be required to pay union dues or fees as a condition of continued employment.

We defend the right of employees who wish to join and be represented by unions. But we also must defend the right of those employees who do not wish to join unions or be represented by them.

The country does not need another weapon which organized labor leaders can use to force American men and women into joining a union or paying dues to keep their jobs.

The economy and the workers would suffer if Senate Bill 1883 becomes law and union organizers are handed a new weapon with which to blackmail employers, into delivering employees into unwanted unions.

[From the Morganton (N.C.) News-Herald, Jan. 19, 1978]

SUCH "REFORMS" WE COULD LIVE WITHOUT

Big Labor looks at the South the way a famished Sylvester looks at Tweetie. And the federal government is doing all it can to help open the cage door.

What else are we to conclude from the progress of a piece of legislation euphemistically referred to as the Labor Reform Bill? The proposal, which appears to be a needless and one-sided extension of the principle of compulsory unionism, was approved by the House of Representatives last fall. Senate action is expected soon after Congress convenes this week.

The fact that the bill has gotten as far as it has is an illustration of the power that George Meany and his colleagues have amassed in Washington through lobbying and generous campaign support. Because if our elected servants in the capital were reflecting the wishes of their constituents, the proposal wouldn't have a chance.

This is demonstrated by the results of a recent survey done by Opinion Research Corporation of Princeton, N.J., for the Chamber of Commerce.

In the poll, a sampling of Americans was asked to describe how they feel about labor unions. A total of 18 percent said unions are "not strong enough," while 51 percent said unions have "grown too powerful and should have their power reduced." Of the remainder, 26 percent said that the labor movement's power is "about right."

In other words, fewer than two out of every 10 citizens of the United States favor giving the unions more power. And yet the House of Representatives, at the urging of President Carter, approved H.R. 8410 last October by a vote of 257 to 163.

What exactly does H.R. 8410 do? In effect, it substantially rewrites the National Labor Relations Act to put even more obstacles in the way of employers trying to resist organizing drives by unions.

For one thing, the National Labor Relations Board would be increased from five to seven members. Considering the political debt that Carter owes to labor unions, it is assumed that he would name two labor sympathizers to the board.

Coupled with this is a provision that three members would be allowed to rule on cases brought before them by NLRB hearing officers. These two sections have been characterized by opponents of the bill (and rightly so, it would seem) as reminiscent of Franklin Roosevelt's attempts to pack the Supreme Court as a way of obtaining favorable rulings.

The original bill also required that union certification elections be held within 15 days after the receipt of an election request. The limit was later extended to 25 days, but the intent is still apprently the same: To allow "quickie" elections that would not give an employer adequate time to respond to a union blitz.

Many other sections of the "reform" measure provide for strong punitive actions aimed at employers found guilty of not bargaining in "good faith." In such cases, the NLRB could force a business to increase wage retroactively by an amount equal to other major union settlements throughout the nation. This requirement, opponents have argued, could bankrupt many smaller, independent businesses.

The bill would require the paying of double back wages to workers deemed to have been fired illegally for organizing activity. It also would authorize the NLRB to outlaw the awarding of any government contracts to companies that violate NLRB orders. It would require employers to subsidize the cost of union election campaigns. And so on and so on.

This rather blatant power grab is motivated by concern over the decline in union clout. Union membership has declined in the last three decades from 35 percent of the nonfarm work force to 25 percent. And last year, for the first time, unions were defeated in more than half of the certification elections held in this country.

This, combined with the survey we mentioned before, shows that unions are losing support. The only way they can reverse the trend is to ram themselves down the throats of the millions of nonunions workers in the Sunbelt states such as North Carolina. That is what the Labor Reform Act is designed to do.

Let's hope the Senate understands that and acts accordingly.

[From the Greensboro Record, Jan. 17, 1978]

BIG LABOR'S BILL

As the 95th Congress's second session prepares to convene, Vice President Mondale has declared the Carter administration to have "no higher priority" in its legislative program than enactment of H.R. 8410, the AFL–CIO's "labor reform" package. The bill cleared the House last session and appears to have strong support in the Senate.

The only known beneficiaries of the proposed revision in the National Labor Relations Act will be the big labor bosses and the machine politicians they carry about in their pockets. The working stiff stands to lose yet another measure of his individual liberty, and the Sunbelt region—especially the Carolinas, with their labor-intensive but unorganized industrial shops—stands to suffer a massive assault on its economy.

As Sen. Orrin Hatch, Republican of Utah and leader of opposition to the labor bill, correctly described it, "this is the first of a series of measures to repeal right-to-work and to force unionization upon the South. It comes as close to repealing the [Taft-Hartley law's] right-to-work provision as is possible without actually doing so."

Rep. Frank Thompson, the New Jersey pol who last autumn attracted a covey of New York media sob sisters to his melodramatic "hearings" at Roanoke Rapids, clucks contentedly about the approaching end of the open shop. "I hope this bill will protect workers," he remarked recently, "by doing away with open shop havens which entice industry with the siren song of cheap and docile labor."

The bill's most portentous provision for the unorganized shops of North Carolina is a requirement for "quickie" elections. Representation elections would have to be held within 15 days after a majority of employees indicated they sought such an election. This would leave employers at an overwhelming disadvantage in presenting their case to employees; unions, on the other hand, usually spend weeks or even months organizing and campaigning before filing formal petitions for representation elections.

The bill would grant the National Labor Relations Board unprecedented punitive powers for use against "unfair" employers. When an employer refused to bargain in good faith, the NLRB would be authorized to award the employees pay raises calculated on the difference between wages actually received and the average percentage of wage increases nationally, as determined by the Bureau of Labor statistics.

The labor bill contains many other obnoxious provisions. What they add up to is big labor's shifting sense of definition: what is "fair" to Meany & Co. is what is to their advantage. The Wagner Act of 1935 was hailed as a touchstone of "fairness" by the labor leaders of the day. Now that union membership is declining—as a result of workers exercising their free choice—big labor is clamoring to have "unfair" voluntarism declared illegal.

A week ago, before the deaths of two of the Senate's leading liberals, Hubert Humphrey and Lee Metcalf, the labor bill was reckoned stoppable only by filibuster. The opposition's chances now are bolstered by the temporary vacancies. Every effort should be made to encourage Senator Hatch and his fellows to stop a "reform" bill unworthy of the name.

[From the Durham Sun, Jan. 18, 1978]

NONREFORM ACT SHOULD BE OPPOSED

Senators will face soon after their return to Washington a major piece of legislation that if passed will have a major effect on the union-management relationship in the United States.

Labeled the "Labor Reform Act of 1977," the legislation would overhaul the National Labor Relations Act. The major provisions would make it easier for unions to organize new members. Other provisions could force employers to lose government contracts or to have the government decide what wages are paid.

The National Labor Relations Act, originally known as the Wagner Act, was designed to provide guidelines that both would protect employers from unreasonable demands and to allow unions to organize within companies. The National Labor Relations Board, which administers the act, and courts, which review NLRB decisions, have worked for 42 years to balance the rights of employers, employees and unions. The so-called "reform" changes would undo much of what has been accomplished.

The National Labor Relations Act has not been changed significantly in about 20 years and some alterations may be needed. We believe, however, that changes should not be so one-sided that they provide neither fairness or reform. We urge Robert Morgan and Jesse Helms, North Carolina's senators, to vote against the proposal as it now reads.

[From the High Point Enterprise, Dec. 29, 1977]

LABOR LAW REFORM

When the U.S. Congress resumes its work after the first of the year, a large banner with the designation H.R. 8410 will be figuratively draped across the chamber of the Senate. It speaks for one of the most explosive issues facing the lawmakers in 1978.

Well before adjournment for the holidays, the House of Representatives passed what has come to be known as the Labor Reform Act. Should it be passed in the Senate, there is little reason to doubt that President Carter will sign it into law.

The battle shaping in the Senate will array administration loyalists and senators in great debt to organized labor against most Republican members, a substantial number of southerners and a few other selected moderates.

In all the whereases of the bill, the essence of it is that it would sharply curtail the permitted period between the calling of a union election and the holding of that election; it would sharply increase the potential penalties that could be assessed against management when it is adjudged guilty of unfair labor practices; and it would increase the number of members of the National Labor Relations Board, essentially to speed up the decision-making process.

These items may be—and will be—assessed according to one's particular opinions and prejudices. The New Haven (Conn.) Register sees them this way: "When the rhetoric is stripped away, when the arguments on both sides are weighed, the primary purpose of the proposed 'reforms' is to assist Big Labor in organizing workers and in promoting compulsory union membership at a time when Big Labor finds itself representing an ever-declining proportion of the nation's work force."

And the Washington Post, which almost always comes down on the side of George Meany, said after the House vote. "It became quite clear as the arguments over this legislation went forward that the people the labor laws were originally written to protect are being increasingly forgotten . . . No one seems to talk in the workers' behalf. The union leaders, of course, claim that they do—and no doubt their predecessors once did. But the rhetoric of this debate underlines the degree to which much of organized labor now acts as an independent force, deeply concerned about its own internal and external needs, which sometimes are—but sometimes are not—the same as the needs of the people it is supposed to be representing."

Big Labor has tried its best to make the reform bill look as benign as possible. It suffered a major defeat earlier when the common site picketing bill was rejected. And it got much less than it wanted in the new minimum wage bill. In that atmosphere, there has been an apparent decision to put on the back burner any attempt to repeal Taft-Hartley's Section 14(b) which permits the states to pass laws outlawing union shop requirements (compulsory unionism) for anyone working in a plant in which a union has been certified as bargaining agent.

We believe the reform bill is simply another device to enable Big Labor to get all these things back through a side entrance rather than through frontal assault which has been repelled.

What remains is a final determination of how many United States senators find themselves sufficiently in debt to Big Labor to bring about a pay-back in 1978, with less than adequate concern for what is good for the nation, not to mention the healthy majority of industrial workers who have chosen to remain outside that same labor embrace.

[From the Public Ledger, Oxford, Dec. 19, 1977]

FREEDOM OF CHOICE

One of the major decisions facing the U.S. Senate in 1978 involves a monumental misnomer—the proposed Labor Reform Act.

This House-passed bill was designed to make it easier for unions, whose membership has not kept up with the expanding work force, to organize a shop or a plant. In other words, what the unions have not been able to achieve on their own would be accomplished by force of law. Big labor is pushing the bill hard. Employer groups are fighting it. Caught somewhere in the middle are the majority of workers who don't belong to unions.

In any organizing campaign, unions already have a big edge. They can propagandize employees from the start—at meetings, even in their own homes. One of the few options open to employers to present the other side is to hold group meetings on company time and premises. The so-called Labor Reform Act, however, would abuse even this by requiring "equal time" for the unions. This is like asking management to help subsidize the union drive.

The proposed law would also provide quickie elections, so unions could take advantage of the one-sided campaign and worker confusion to get a favorable vote.

The real issue involved here is freedom of choice—namely, the right of employees to make up their own minds in a free, unhurried manner. Congress, rather than worrying about the unions' hurt feelings at their increasing lack of popularity, should be worrying about protecting the American worker from further coercion—whether it comes from big labor, big business, or, for that matter, big government.

[From the Wadesboro Messenger & Intelligencer, Dec. 8, 1977]

"JOB-KILLER" ACT BEFORE CONGRESS

"Job-Killer," "anti-employee" and "anti-small business" are some of the labels America's 700,000 small businessmen have given the "Labor Reform Act of 1977" now under consideration by the Senate Human Resources Committee.

And they appear to be justified when one reviews the nearly 100 pages of carefully documented testimony presented before the Senate Committee by the spokesman for the Small Business Legislative Council, which represents more than 400 national, regional, state and local associations throughout the United States led by the National Small Business Association.

He is Peter Nash, and one must assume he is thoroughly competent to speak on the subject in view of his experience as a former solicitor of the U.S. Department of Labor and also as a former general counsel for the National Labor Relations Board—which the Act purportedly seeks to make more efficient, but which Nash claims would put the Board in a statutory straight jacket.

Labor is attempting, says Nash, through bills advertised as "labor reform," to stack the odds by curtailing legitimate employee information sources and legitimate employer opposition. He said this is because organized labor has been losing more NLRB elections than it has been winning and because labor represents an ever decreasing portion of the American work force.

The proposed law will hit small businesses and their employees hardest, Nash claims, because 98 percent of all NLRB elections are held in companies with fewer than 400 employees, and 75 per cent occur in companies with fewer than 50 employees.

Nash emphasizes that small opposition to the Labor Reform Act of 1977 is not based on anti-labor sentiment but in careful, professional analysis of the potential consequences to employee and employer. He says, instead, that small business has a very selfish interest in genuine labor law reform, because it can least afford the uncertainty of Labor Board delays in resolving unfair labor practice cases. He points out that it is small business that is hardest hit by back-pay awards to ex-employees who have not worked for months, or through retroactive compensation to working employees.

Mr. Nash believes much of the sting can be eliminated if the Act is amended to exclude small businesses with less than 50 employees from NLRB jurisdiction. This would shield 87 per cent of small businesses from the Act.

While the logic of Mr. Nash's testimony seem irrefutable, it is no secret that Congress is not always motivated by logic—it has been known to bend to the pressures of vote-rich lobbies like organized labor.

To counteract that powerful pressure would require a tremendous outpouring of opinion to members of the Senate against the proposed Act by both employees and owners of small businesses everywhere. America certainly does not need legislation to force bankruptcies and job losses at this or any other time!

[From the Kannapolis Independent, Nov. 2, 1977]

DON'T STACK DECK

Contrary to what organized labor would have us believe, North Carolina is not sinking into a bottomless pit of unemployment and poor wages. Statistics prove the state—which happens to be the least unionized in the nation—is, in fact, second only to California in economic growth.

Not only does North Carolina have the second fastest growing economy in the United States, but industrial development experts say the state may set a new record for growth.

State Commerce Secretary D. M. Faircloth told the Board of Economic Development the state's industries spent $460.5 million through September on expansion and new industries brought in another $302.1 million. He said that total of $762.6 million compared to $718.8 million for the same period last year. The board was told, too, that a recent trade delegation to Japan made valuable contacts and drew at least one serious inquiry from a Japanese firm interested in building a plant in North Carolina.

Unemployment in the state continues well below the national average and with industrial expansion running at a record-setting pace, this obviously adds up to more jobs, refuting organized labor's negative criticism of the right-to-work law.

Add all this to the fact that North Carolina's manufacturing workers earned an average of $4.14 per hour after midyear—another all-time high—and it become a good example why organized labor is going all out to push congressional approval of so-called "reform" of the National Labor Relations Act.

The changes sought with the blessing of President Carter are, despite rhetoric to the contrary, intended to expand union membership and, thus, union influence among working people of the country.

With union membership declining, organized labor is counting heavily on changing the laws in its favor. As one Connecticut newspaper points out, "It certainly must be difficult for anyone to believe that abuses by business and industry have been the major reason for the decline in union membership as a percentage of the working force. Through a system of compulsory dues, unions certainly have no shortage of funds for organizing efforts. One need only look to the excess funds unions always seem to have available to assist in financing the election campaigns of candidates whose views they share.

"It must be, therefore, that fewer and fewer workers care to be represented by unions, to be members of collective bargaining units, to pay compulsory union dues to finance other organizing efforts and the campaigns of candidates for elective office when they, personally, might be actively supporting the Big Labor's candidate's opponent."

The present law, passed in 1935, favors neither side and has—overall—served the nation well. What Big Labor wants is to stack the deck in its favor and President Carter, owing a big campaign debt to unions, is ready to pay off at the expense of the nation's labor-management balance.

The President and Congress, should keep in mind that the great majority of working Americans do not belong to unions and apparently do not want union representation. Ignoring their responsibilities to the millions in this labor—not union—force would be a blatant sell-out of a basic right shared by all Americans: individual freedom of association.

A Bill That Tilts Things in Labor's Favor

(By William D. Snider)

Before the U.S. Senate moves decisively on the so-called Labor Reform Act of 1978, its members need to take a closer look at the fine print.

Because of a bland facade and an assortment of amendments that appeared rather harmless, it passed the House last fall without much ado (257–163). Now it's calendared to follow debate on the Panama Canal treaties.

AFL–CIO President George Meany has been touting the bill as top priority—and perhaps it is, since Big Labor's popularity today approaches an all-time low. Some 20 years ago one-third of American workers in non-farm jobs belonged to unions; now that's dropped below one-fourth. The AFL–CIO itself has lost some 500,000 members in the last two years, and its total membership is down to about 13.5 million.

No wonder, then, Meany concentrates on pushing these "reforms" which are really no "reforms" at all. They simply tilt things in labor's favor—making it easier to organize workers, whether they want to be organized or not, and harder for employers to resist.

Now some relief might be in order if the deck had been stacked initially in the employer's favor. But that's not the case. What the bill does mainly is speed up union-representation elections requested by workers and prescribe severe penalties for labor-law violations by employers.

Elections would have to be conducted within 14 days after petitions are filed by a majority of workers (instead of the present 45). That would greatly curtail responses by employers and employees not interested in union representation. It goes without saying that union representatives spend far longer than 14 days organizing their election campaigns. While employers shouldn't be allowed to stall, they do deserve equal time.

The bill's penalty provisions are severe. One would require double backpay, rather than straight back-pay provided under existing law, for workers charged with having been fired illegally for organizing activities.

Another penalty would deny federal contracts to employers who resist unions illegally. And still another amounts to price fixing: If an employer's bargaining didn't suit the National Labor Relations Board, it could compel him to raise wages and benefits by whatever percentage the board equated with "major collective bargaining settlements in the nation."

What is alarming about this bureaucratic tilting is that nothing in the bill requires comparable penalties if unions engage in the same kind of activities.

Alternative legislation to deal with any coercive maneuvering on labor's part was pushed aside by the House. Presently U.S. Senators are under heavy pressure from lobbyists on both sides—but principally from the Carter Administration concerned with paying off political debts to Big Labor.

The Washington Post, hardly anti-labor, made an important point here: "It became quite clear as the arguments over this legislation went forward (in the House) that the people the labor laws were originally written to protect are being increasingly forgotten . . . The union leaders, of course, claim that they do—and no doubt their predecessors once did. But the rhetoric of this debate underlines the degree to which much of organized labor now acts as an independent force, deeply concerned about its own internal and external needs, which sometimes are—but sometimes are not—the same as the needs of the people it is supposed to be representing."

An even worst indictment came from an individual who knows first hand what he's talking about: Edward Miller, former chairman of the National Labor Relations Board. Passage of S. 1883, he said, would increase delay instead of improve NLRB performance. It would result in another "litigation explosion"—the kind that cause so many nightmares in negotiations involving HEW and OSHA. Miller says the NLRB presently has an "extraordinarily high settlement rate." This has kept the size of the agency within bounds and the cost to the taxpayer at least tolerable.

Under Meany's latest broadside, voluntary settlements would be reduced. The NLRB would be faced with an inundation "paralleling that which has rendered the EEOC an almost totally ineffective agency."

Has the U.S. Senate called on the NLRB itself to help weigh the impact of these dangerous changes in the labor law? Apparently not. But senators, including North Carolina's Robert Morgan, had better get more testimony from the real world before they blandly follow the House's lead.

[From the Kinston Free Press, Feb. 5, 1978]

Labor Reform

If the U.S. Senate adopts the proposed Labor Reform Bill (S. 1883), a good many of the freedoms of both labor and management will be abridged.

The House has already approved a labor law revision bill which, if ultimately put into effect, would subject employers who resist compulsory union shop demands to harsh and expensive government-imposed financial penalties. It would also result in forcing workers to pay union dues in order to obtain or retain a job.

The proposed labor reform legislation is both repressive and coercive. It impinges on the freedom of individuals to make a choice. It severely curtails the rights of employers to "say their piece" when efforts are under way to unionize their firms.

We do not question the right of anyone to join a labor union if he wants to. That is an individual right. It's a part of American freedom.

We are opposed, however, to any effort, direct or indirect, that would result in forcing someone to pay union dues in order to obtain or retain a job.

The right to work laws have been upheld in this part of the country for sometime now. Under these laws, workers may choose to work where they may—there are no "open shops" or "closed shops". The individual employee's success on the job is measured, not by union pressured demands, but by his ability to do the job the way his employer wants it done.

The right to work is one of the bastions of American freedom. It is part and parcel of the three predominant rights granted every man—the right to life, liberty and property. If an individual is deprived of his right to live his life the way he wants to—and this includes the right to work wherever he wants to and can find a job—his liberties are abridged.

The labor reform legislation adopted by the House and due for Senate action in the near future, is in direct contradiction of freedom. It should be opposed vigorously by our constitutionally elected representatives in the Congress. The right to work should form the bedrock of our system of government. Union-sponsored legislation that would weaken this right should be soundly defeated. In so doing, a telling blow will be struck against the union bosses who would rule the country if they could.

[From the Shelby Daily Star, Feb. 3, 1978]

Change Without Reform

The latest reason why labor unions are so dead-set on having the Congress pass a law with the laughably inaccurate title of "Labor Reform Act" comes from the knowledge that another labor union has just gotten a comeupance.

The American Federation of Television and Radio Artists (AFTRA) is composed of persons who appear on radio and television more than once. Indeed, until last month, the union commanded that television and radio stations and networks, with whom there was a union contract, not allow persons to appear on camera or microphone unless they belonged to a union. AFTRA didn't consider it funny when columnists William F. Buckley and M. Stanton Evans refused to join up and even entered suit against AFTRA to prevent their controlling the cameras and microphones. That is the job, the two columnists said, of the station and network management.

The courts agreed, and Mr. Buckley and Mr. Evans even pressed the point so that AFTRA must advise radio and television outlets that union membership is no longer required. AFTRA had finally admitted it couldn't command union membership, but it didn't want to tell radio and television stations and networks about its admission. The courts had to force AFTRA to do so.

Score one for freedom of employment.

Then comes a former Washington Post editorial writer who was pressed into service in a television debate. Being a free lancer, he needed the money the appearance would bring. Two weeks, then a month after his television appearance, his check still hadn't arrived; he discovered AFTRA had commanded that the station send the check to the union so that it could coerce the former editorial writer into joining the union. It was not until the writer went all the way to union headquarters to argue his case that he got his paycheck, albeit ever so reluctantly given by the union. But why for goodness' sake should the union have ever touched his check?

Now, of course, the unions—including AFTRA—want more power. We can't imagine why they would need it when they have the power to hold a person's paycheck or the power to keep people off of television and radio. Indeed, if anything, the Labor Reform Act ought to remove some power were it really "reform." Certainly we can't think of anyone who would willingly join a union so the union bosses can keep their paychecks in a drawer.

From Where I Sit

(By Johnny Morrow)

Big Labor is inconspicuously trying to subjugate America's working people to compulsory unionism. Forces are lobbying in our Senate, attempting to ram down the public's throat the Labor Reform Act. If passed, small retailers would be severely penalized.

They would be forced to pay wages based on negotiations for units of 5,000 employees. This hardly seems fair because in 1976, about 75 percent of all National Labor Relations Board elections involved 49 or fewer employees. Many small retailers with a narrow profit margin would, quite naturally, be forced to capitulate to union demands. In sum, it would tilt the laws in favor of labor, and against business and industry. If Big Labor is successful in its bid for excessive power, the consequences would be staggering.

The Labor Reform Act has certain provisions to protect the interest of workers, which is good. But the main objective is to protect the interests of unions as unions, and not as representatives of workers. The emboldened labor movement would set out to repeal the right-to-work provision that allows states to outlaw compulsory unionism. It would repeal the Hatch Act, so that government employees could become politically active. Time and space doesn't permit listing of the many incongruities between Big Labor and small business that would ultimately arise should our Senate pass the aforementioned labor proposal.

Such a law would have more far-reaching effects on the man in the street than big union bosses are willing to admit. Labor claims workers should receive a fair chance to decide whether they want union representation. But the fine print of the bill, which labor bosses are soft-peddling and underplaying, is that it's a legal move for a further and more extensive labor takeover of American industry. The bill would make it easier for unions to organize new members by providing quick elections for union certification. It would require double back pay without mitigation to workers fired for alleged union activities during organizing campaigns, but at no other time. It blacklists employers from federal contracts to the detriment of employees. The federal government would be plunged directly into the collective bargaining process with the National Labor Relations Board ordering pay boosts under certain conditions. This could mean an end to small businesses (the little man).

The Carter administration supports the Labor Reform Act, possibly to the point of upsetting the delicate balance of power between unions and management. Some feel that Carter support results from strong criticism by AFL-CIO President George Meany. Critics may very well see this support as an effort to heal the rift with the unions whose support helped make Jimmy Carter our President. With laws already on the books to deal with unfair labor practices and others to let workers democratically choose whether to organize, there is no reason to tinker with the law making it favorable to labor in order to help Jimmy Carter make atonements with George Meany.

We could learn a valuable lesson from our "Mother Country," Britain. Firemen are demanding a 32 percent pay increase while the government strives to hold inflation in check with a minimum hike of 10 percent. The firemen's demands obviously will set the pattern for other unions and other future strikes and labor disruptions. Britain's plight is well known and documented. George Santayana said "those who refuse to learn from history are doomed to repeat it." Should the Labor Reform Act pass, every group and facet of our nation would suffer. Especially we here in the South, mostly because we have the reputation of being anti-union. New industry would avoid this particular area. Strikes and slowdowns would become common-place, unemployment would remain dangerously high, inflation would run rampant, and the markets and services would be taken over.

George Meany and Labor Secretary Marshall plan to use a sledgehammer approach to bolster their declining union membership roles, enrich union coffers and bring about forced unionization. Big Labor's prime target is the small business community. Write your Senators today! Let it be known that you are against the Labor Reform Act (S. 1883). After all, this is your country the unions are trying to overtake. Don't fall victim to push-button and unionism!

A Most Important Fight

The battle is joined over S. 1883, the Senate version of the so-called "labor reform" bill that has already passed the House. Business and labor are trotting out their finest arguments and their biggest guns. A fight to the finish appears to be brewing.

One ought to be. S. 1883 has been called everything from restrictive to coercive. More could be said. It is labor's big payoff for helping elect Jimmy Carter. We hope it will be the final payoff.

After a decade of losses, organized labor looks upon this bill as its salvation, as a way to change the climate, to get the government more firmly on its side. Quite simply, the bill would change the rules to put the federal establishment at the negotiating table on the side of the unions. Government has no place there. It intrudes too much already.

We have discussed this bill before. We have outlined many of its features and opposed most all of them. It would allow what opponents are calling "quickie" elections. It would permit an election to go ahead without a clear definition of the bargaining unit, an invitation to a business-management version of the black satchel ballot. It would establish harsh new penalties against business despite the fact that businesses who refuse to follow the law are already subject to severe penalties. It would enable unions to campaign on company property during working hours. It would impose no new restrictions on unions.

The issue is considered so important that business organizations across the nation are cracking up for a last-ditch battle during the next two weeks. The Asheboro-Randolph Chamber of Commerce is among those groups, devoting its entire January newsletter to the subject.

Labeling this legislation "reform" is the kind of mockery which too often makes law in this image-conscious world of ours. This is special interest legislation, pure and simple, and it ought to be recognized for what it is.

The United States Senate is the last place the bill can be stopped. Labor has won in the House and Jimmy Carter will sign it in a jiffy. The battle in the Senate will shape the future of management-labor relations for years. This may be the most important issue that body will face this year.

[From the Goldsboro News-Argus, Jan. 29, 1978]

Labor Reform Measure Would Promote Unions

The fact that labor leaders and congressmen from heavily unionized states are so enthusiastically for it is a clear signal that the "Labor Reform" bill is slanted heavily in favor of organized labor.

The reasons are obvious.

Future targets are clear.

And the prospects, for non-unionized areas, and especially for the South, are ominous, should the measure—already passed by the House—be approved by the Senate.

A key provision of the reform bill would require elections to be held within 15 days after being petitioned for by the organizers.

On this subject, William Winpisinger, president of the International Association of Machinists and Aerospace Workers, says:

"As a statistical matter of fact, if we get prompt elections, we win. Every time it takes more than two weeks, we know we lose. . . ."

The timing of an election is significant for obvious reasons. Organizers may work for weeks with employees before the employers realize what is happening.

Under the reform bill, the employer would be highly limited in time to respond in an effort to counteract gains already made by organizers.

The bill would limit the business owner even farther.

It would require that he provide, at his expense and during working hours, equal time for organizers to respond to any arguments he might make to dissuade workers from joining a union.

Should a firm, however innocently violate labor regulations it could be barred for three years from being awarded federal contracts. Should the National Labor Relations Board order such a debarment, there is not apparent provision for appeal.

Should an employer, in the opinion of the NLRB, dismiss an employee for union-related activities, double backpay could be awarded the worker.

Those concerned about union expansionism see the reform bill as a particular threat to smaller businesses which lack the experience and expertise to deal with labor union organizers.

Many, opponents of the bill feel, would capitulate to organizational efforts rather than risk making a costly error that could result in loss of government contractors or excessive reimbursement to workers who might be dismissed wrongly in the eyes of the NLRB.

Organized labor is understandably pleased with the prospects of the legislation.

It has suffered serious setbacks in the past two years—membership falling by more than 760,000 during that period.

Congressmen from heavily unionized states are understandably supportive of the measure.

Not only are the unions influential—financially and at the ballot box—in their states, but they have seen a steady movement of industries to non-union states.

If unions can be encouraged in those areas, notably the South, then the migration of industry might be stemmed.

If the labor reform bill represented a fair shake for all concerned, big labor would not be so exuberant in its support of it—and the business people would not be so gravely concerned over its potential results.

The measure clearly would grease the wheels of organized labor and give organizers strong advantages over businesses least able to protect their own interests.

[From the Asheboro Courier Tribune, Jan. 28, 1978]

Labor and the Law

It will be next year before the Senate is able to consider the so-called "labor reform" legislation put forth by the AFL–CIO and happily endorsed by the Carter administration. The House has already passed its version of this bill designed more to protect the flagging interests of the unions than to "reform" the body of labor law.

Its net effect, if passed, will be to greatly increase the power of the National Labor Relations Board, traditionally a firm friend of Big Labor and a questionable proponent of the rights of the individual worker. There is a natural tendency for the NLRB's pro-labor bias to increase under Democratic administrations and, even under existing law, the number rulings friendly to organized labor may be expected to increase under existing law as the years of Jimmy Carter drag along.

With this legislation, the discretionary powers of the NLRB will be greatly increased and that, in turn, will increase the probability that some businesses will be coerced into dealing with unwanted and unneeded labor unions in order to avoid substantial losses at the hands of the NLRB. The board will have within its grasp the power to inflict real financial damage to businesses. Some examples:

—Employers found guilty of unfair activities would be forced to double the back pay of employees fired for certain reasons during a bargaining period.

—Under the same circumstances, employers would be forced to retroactively increase employee wages and benefits by the percentage of increase in "major collective bargaining settlements" throughout the nation.

—An employer would be prohibited from bidding on government contracts for three years whenever the NLRB is "of the opinion" that the employer is in violation of any order issued by the board during the past three years.

While the first two requirements could be prohibitively expensive to many businesses, the third, quite simply, could put a number of firms straight into bankruptcy. Like it or not, the federal government is a major source of contracts in this day and age and any outright ban on federal business could prove devastating to any number of companies.

Why does Big Labor want this legislation so badly? Are the existing laws, under which it prospered for years, not enough?

Evidently not. Its halycon days have faded and the failure of labor to attract and sustain new membership has become one of the significant developments of the latter half of the century. Labor is going to the well more and losing more and that trend threatens the political base from which it has operated since the days of the Depression.

The figures tell the story. In 1970, only 24.5 percent of all non-agricultural employees in the nation were union members, the lowest percentage since 1937. Union members now comprise only 20.1 percent of the national work force, a 20 percent decline in little more than two decades. Unions sustained a net loss of 767,000 dues-paying members between 1974 and 1976, its first actual numerical decline in 14 years. And, most galling to organizers, Big Labor lost more union elections in 1976 than it won—despite the fact that existing law places the timing of these elections almost solely in the hands of the labor unions.

Supporters of the bill pulled out all the stops in the House—and won. You may expect a similar effort in the Senate.

Organized labor has won a distinct notch in the American society. Its accomplishments in many instances are noteworthy. But a union ought to be able to sell itself on the benefits it can produce for its members, not on its ability to punish employers who logically resist its efforts. The Senate should defeat this legislation.

IS THIS LABOR REFORM?

The so-called Labor Reform Bill, now being considered by Congress, seems to be, in reality, little more than a push by labor to gain new members. Union membership has been decreasing steadily over the past several years, so it isn't surprising that union leaders would want to do something about this.

But the Labor Reform Bill (S. 1883-H.R. 8410) tries to solve labor's membership problems by mandating several new policies which are blatantly unfair to employers.

For example, the Senate version of the bill would allow unions to call elections within 15 days if a majority of employes seek the election. This hardly seems enough time for an employer to do an adequate job of presenting his side of the story.

The bill would also allow union organizers to talk to employes about the union on company property and on company time. Unions are already allowed to contact employes at their homes, but employers are forbidden to do this.

The bill also has disturbing punitive provisions. The most disturbing is one which states that employers who willfully violate a National Labor Relations Board order would be prohibited from obtaining federal contracts for up to three years. This is an extremely tough penalty. It would put many firms out of business, which doesn't even make sense from the union's point of view.

Another provision says that if NLRB finds that an employer has refused to bargain in good faith for a particular period, it can impose mandatory wage rates on the employer for that period.

This provision would work a real hardship on small businesses, since their wages, on which the enforced wage rates would be based—are average wages paid to bargaining units of 5,000 or more workers.

Another provision requires the NLRB to seek a court-ordered reinstatement of any worker believed to be illegally discharged during a union organizing campaign. This means an employer may be forced to re-hire workers who have been fired for good cause.

If the bill passes, it could easily have the effect of making employers throw up their hands and allow unionization of their firms, whether their employes want it or not, just to avoid these unreasonable penalties.

This, of course, would increase union membership. And this is what big labor wants.

SENATE BILL 1883

An alleged "Labor Reform" bill is scheduled to be voted on in the Senate on Feb. 1, 1978. This bill is aimed not at the corporate giants but at small business. It would slow a declining union membership by making organizing efforts easier.

The most objectionable part of this bill is that it is an unbalanced piece of legislation. Obviously, not all union activities are bad, but in this case the government will become an agent of the unions rather than a neutral third party.

Punitive measures will be directed at the small employer who resists union demands to organize a small business. One has only to think of the options open to a small business at resisting the encroachment of the IRS or OSHA to imagine the almost nonexistent possibility of resisting union organization with government policies backing the unions.

Consider whether you want to have a say in the manner of membership when and if your company is petitioned. The Labor Reform Act assumes everyone wants to belong to a union.

Once a petition is filed an election to vote on unionization must be held in 15 days. If a Union needs more time, it can have 45 and even up to 75 additional days to prepare. The employer 15 days from the time he is petitioned.

The employer would virtually be forced to underwrite unionization efforts. If the employer communicated his side of the picture to employees, he would be required to give the unions organizers company time to communicate in an equivalent manner.

Senate bill 1883 changes the National Labor Relations Act from a remedial statute to a punitive one. Its purpose will be to punish employers while looking aside at union abuses.

The net result of this bill would most likely be to discourage employers from presenting their side of the issues, and thereby allowing an unopposed solicitation of employees who will hear only the union arguments.

The Labor Reform Act should be held up to a strong light for intensive study of its ultimate effect on the economy and the nation.

If you are concerned about this forthcoming legislation, now is the time to communicate your feelings to your elected representatives.

LABOR BILL INVITES MORE UNION ABUSES

Congress finds itself arguing over labor issues every year. Most of these hold only passing interest for the average news reader. The chief labor bill this year—proposed revisions to the National Labor Relations Act—is much different.

If enacted, it will drastically alter the balance of power between organized labor and businesses. This is one piece of legislation that should concern everyone.

The National Labor Relations Act is the country's basic labor law. Passed in 1935, it established workers' rights to organize and strike, and it barred employers from engaging in certain unfair labor practices. Later amendments placed curbs on unfair union activities.

Labor maintains that over the years businesses have found ways to evade the intent of the law and that some businesses actually do evade it, which is true. Business groups charge that unions take advantage of the law in the same way and that restrictions on improper union practices were lax to begin with, which also is true.

Most labor-management disputes proceed in an orderly and lawful way, but those few that don't usually see abuses committed by both sides. The legislation before Congress would "correct" this problem by placing even tighter restrictions on management and by imposing severe penalties on employers for violations. Unions, meanwhile, would be free to go about their activities as usual.

Consider a few of the bill's major provisions. Present law requires that when a business fires a worker for union organizing efforts, the worker must be rehired with compensation for lost wages. Under the revision, the employer must award double back pay to the worker. What about unions that use threats or reprisals to coerce employees? The bill does not address this question.

Any business deemed by the National Labor Relations Board (NLRB) to be a flagrant labor law violator could be denied government contracts for three years. But what about unions that consistently engage in unfair practices? Again, the legislation does not provide for comparable penalties.

When the NLRB determined that an employer had illegally refused to negotiate a first contract with the union, it could order the employer to compensate workers for wages lost during the interim. The award would reflect the difference between workers' actual wages and what they would have received under an average collective bargaining contract. If a union contributed to the delay in an effort to gain higher benefits, however, it would not be subject to similar damages.

These are just a few examples, but they show how the legislation was written. It was written by and for labor, and it is aimed entirely at business.

By attempting to prevent only those abuses committed by management, the bill would encourage even more abuses by labor. A one-sided remedy is worse than no remedy at all.

Yet the legislation was passed by the House last year, with the Carter administration's endorsement, and it stands a good chance of passage by the Senate this year. If people are concerned, now is the time to show it.

LABOR GRABS FOR MORE POWER

Big labor's push to rewrite the National Labor Relations Act to give labor bosses more monopoly power over all of us will reach a critical stage in the U.S. Senate in 1978.

Labor has already won the battle in the House of Representatives, so the only hope to moderate or kill this legislation lies with the U.S. Senate, which will be considering S. 1883.

Farm Bureau members and others interested in bringing some control over the growing monopoly power of labor unions should contact their Senators to express opposition to this so-called "labor refrom" act.

The bill, which could be on the Senate floor by the end of January, (1) will make it easier and quicker for the unions to force an election, (2) Violates property rights and stifles the freedom of speech of employers, (3) Places more decision-making power in the hands of the lower administrative ranks of the National Labor Relations Board, (4) Would load the National Labor Relations Board in favor of the unions, (5) Will make it more difficult and much slower to get a vote by workers who are already unionized on the question of "throwing out the union," (6) For the first time, would involve the Board in punitive actions, which in the past have been left to the courts.

All of this adds up to more power for the unions. We believe that most Americans think the unions already have too much power and that what Congress should be doing is passing legislation to better protect the rights of individual workers.

For the first time. USDA has reported that labor employed in the distribution system now gets more out of every dollar consumers spend for food than the farmers who produce it. This drives home to us the need to stop any further actions by the United States Congress to grant more power to the unions.

It is true that agriculture has an exemption from the National Labor Relations Act and that S. 1883 does not propose to remove that exemption. However, farmers and everyone else are affected by the excessive demands and power of the unions, and if this bill should become law, their appetite will be whetted for further amendments, including removal of the agricultural exemption and repeal of Section 14 (B) which permits states to pass right-to-work laws that outlaw compulsory unionism.

LABOR REFORM?

The so called Labor Reform Bill, now being considered in Congress, seems to be, in reality, a push by Big Labor to gain new members.

Union membership has been decreasing steadily over the past several years, so it's not surprising that Union Leaders would want to do something about this. But the Labor Reform Bill (S. 1883–H.R. 8410) tries to solve Labor's membership problems by mandating several new policies which are blatantly unfair to employers.

For instance, the Senate version of the bill would allow unions to call elections within 15 days if a majority of employees seek the election. This hardly seems like enough time for an employer to do an adequate job of presenting his side of the story. The bill would also allow union organizers to talk to employees about the union on company property during company time, if the employer has done so. Unions are already allowed to contract employees at their homes, but employers are forbidden to do this. This prohibition would remain.

The bill also has disturbing punitive provisions. The most disturbing is one which states that employers who willfully violate a National Labor Relations Board order would be prohibited from obtaining federal contracts for up to three years. That is an extremely stiff penalty. It would put many firms out of business, which doesn't even make sense from the union's point of view.

Another provision says that if NLRB finds that an employer has refused to bargain in good faith for a particular period, it can impose mandatory wage rates on the employer for that period. The wage rates will be based on the average wages paid to bargaining units of 5,000 or more employees—in other words, large firms. The National Federation of Independent Business (NFIB), with a membership of more than 525,000 small businesses around the country, has noted that this provision would work a real hardship on small businesses, since their wages are normally much lower than big business wages. It would also directly involve the federal government in setting wage rates in the private sector, something that has been carefully avoided in the 42-year history of labor law.

A third provision requires the NLRB to seek an immediate court-ordered reinstatement of any employee believed to be illegally discharged during a union organizing campaign, until the NLRB has time to make a final decision on the merits of the case. This means an employer may be forced to temporarily re-hire employees who have been fired for good cause. The senate version of the bill adds that illegally fired employees must be reinstated with double back pay.

If the Labor Reform Bill passes, it could easily have the effect of making employers throw up their hands and allow unionization of their firms, whether their employees want it or not, just to avoid these unreasonable penalties. This, of course, would increase union membership. And this is what Big Labor wants.

INFLATION—AND WHAT GOVERNMENT WILL NOT DO ABOUT IT

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, in the last few days there have been a spate of editorials calling for action—primarily congressional action to meet this country's No. 1 economic problem: Inflation.

These editorials could hardly be more timely. While the economy has been growing with more jobs, better profits, improving retail sales especially in the basic housing and auto sectors, reports on prices have been progressively worse.

Any consideration of such fundamental elements of future prices such as farm prices, raw material prices, recent wage settlements indicates how much more serious inflation is likely to become as the year goes on.

In the second place, President Carter is expected to unveil an anti-inflationary program in the next few days, so editorial comment provides a useful basis for appraising the strength or weakness of the Carter answer to inflation.

Mr. President, consideration of what kind of medicine we need to slow inflation makes it evident that whatever we do, it will be politically painful, and the more effective it is the more painful it will be.

A recent essay in Time magazine by Marshall Loeb entitled "Ten Ways to Cut Inflation" illustrated this point very well.

The recommendations are all anti-inflationary. Some of them, frankly, I could not support. But President Carter could make a strong appeal for each one, and enough should be acted on to slow inflation. And yet, Mr. President, it is a sad commentary on the political vigor of our economic policy that only a single one of the 10 recommendations has a better than 1 chance in 10 of being acted on favorably by the President and the Congress. And that one recommendation, that has a chance to limit Federal pay increases to 5 percent instead of 6 percent would have only a slight, marginal effect on prices.

Consider the others:

First. Reduce the budget. Yes indeed. We should. Some of us will fight hard to do that, but there is every likely prospect that the Congress will increase probably by $10 billion or more the Carter budget, not reduce it by $20 billion as Mr. Loeb and Time recommend.

Second. Curb regulations especially so business will not be required to invest huge sums in nonproductive machinery and then raise prices as a result. It is just possible that there is enough business clout behind such action if called for by the President that it could work, but the main consequences would be on prices 2 or 3 years ahead.

Third. Restrain social security benefits. This is probably the most unrealistic of all Time's proposals. But there is no question it would ease inflationary pressures.

Fourth. Hold down State wages. Time proposes the President ask States to hold down State and local wages to a 5-percent increase. With even New York in its desperate shape going to 6 percent on transit workers wages, it would be a miracle if others States and cities most of whom have their best surpluses in years could be persuaded to cut increases below the likely increases in the cost of living.

Fifth. Cut local taxes. This might occur in some States and cities, but it would be likely to be sporadic and in view of inflation's effect on local and State costs, and the fact that local and State revenues are not only less progressive but less responsive to inflation, this kind of reduction does not seem hopeful.

Sixth. Chop farm subsidies and controls. Again a very powerful case can be made for this as a prime requirement for easing inflation. But the last Senate response and the likely House and administration response to farm pressure makes action of this kind about as unlikely as the proposed reduction in social security benefits.

Seventh. Repeal inflationary special interest laws. The Time essay cites the Jones Act and the Davis Bacon Act. The prospect of repealing either is close to nil.

Eighth. Hold back the minimum wage. In view of the fact that this legislation only recently passed the Congress, the prospect of a delay or moratorium are infinitesimal.

Ninth. Freeze executive pay. The proposal is to increase the salary of no one who earns more than $100,000 per year. Last year this kind of compensation from corporations increased by a record amount. The increase will depend far more on what happens to corporate profits—which are likely to rise—than to any kind of moral plea. So relief here is also very unlikely.

Mr. President, what all this adds up to is that the likelihood of any kind of effective anti-inflationary policy is very, very slim. Maybe that very fact will help this body resist some of the consistent, every day inflationary pressure we are sure to face in coming months. It is time we took far more notice of inflation and vote and work to meet this No. 1 domestic problem.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Time magazine essay by Marshall Loeb be printed in the RECORD at this point.

There being no objection, the essay was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TEN WAYS TO CUT INFLATION

The most distressing thing about last week's news that consumer prices swelled at a 7.4 percent annual rate in February was that Washington's policymakers were relieved. They had expected the rise to be worse. Indeed, many of them take high inflation for granted, which is the first step toward giving up the fight. They forget too easily that not too long ago 3 percent inflation was considered to be steep, 4 percent dangerous, 5 percent intolerable. Now experts, chorus that the U.S. has an "underlying" inflation rate of at least 6 percent—intractable, indomitable, unassailable.

In fact, the inflation rate can—and must—be brought down. There is no mystery about what causes inflation: too many demands by too many people upon a limited amount of national wealth. The cure is more difficult to prescribe, but surely it involves discipline, limits, sacrifice. The means to retard inflation are economically feasible, but they are thought to be politically impractical. We know many of the ways; all we lack is the will.

The will is notably absent during election year, since any attack on inflation would hit at the privileges of specific interest groups, who threaten their fearsome counterattacks at the polls. But perhaps some politicians would be brave enough, and wise enough, to advocate steps that would earn the outrage of specific interests in the short run but gain the support of the inflation-strained majority over the longer haul. Among the steps that, taken together, could cut inflation:

REDUCE THE BUDGET

President Carter emptily claims that his budget for the next fiscal year is "tight," although it has soared since 1974 from less than $270 billion to more than $500 billion, and the planned deficit will run an inflationary $60 billion-plus for the second straight year. With the economy rising and unemployment falling, even Treasury Secretary W. Michael Blumenthal and the rest of Carter's closest economic advisers believe that the deficit should be contained. Wisconsin Democrat William Proxmire, one of the Senate's best economic thinkers, argues that the budget should be shrunk to $465 billion. At the very least, it could be reduced to $480 billion by selective paring. If spending is brought down, the Government will be able to further cut personal and corporate taxes, which would offer the double benefit of strapping inflation and stimulating the economy. For invigorating the economy, lower taxes are more effective than higher Government spending.

CURB REGULATION

The spreading powers of the Environmental Protection Agency, the Occupational Safety and Health Administration, the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission and hundreds of other regulatory agencies aggravate inflation by adding to the budget and, more important, swelling the costs of doing business. One significant step would be to hold down the EPA's "enforcement" spending, which is budgeted to jump from $73 million to almost $95 million. Every dollar devoted to EPA "enforcement" obliges U.S. business to invest many more dollars on nonproductive machinery, which then raises prices, reduce productive capital spending and retards hiring.

RESTRAIN SOCIAL SECURITY BENEFITS

They are scheduled to rise fast in the years ahead. By trimming the benefits, the nation can also pare the scheduled increases in Social Security payroll taxes.

LIMIT FEDERAL PAY

The Government's workers commonly collect more salary and fringes than private workers in comparable jobs, and federal pay is budgeted to increase 6 percent in the next fiscal year. If Carter succeeded in cutting that back to 5 percent or less, he would both reduce inflation in the federal payroll and gain moral authority to advocate similar restraint in private wages.

HOLD DOWN STATE WAGES

Having urged a reduction in federal pay increases, the President then could ask states and localities to hold raises for their employees to 5 percent or less.

CUT LOCAL TAXES

If their projected wage increases were reduced, the states and cities could trim their sales, income or property taxes. Another reason for reduction: many states and localities are enjoying budget surpluses.

CHOP FARM SUBSIDIES AND CONTROLS

Federal farm aid has grown fourfold in the past two years, to an estimated $7.9 billion, and the Senate passed a farm bill last month that will add $120 to $170 to the food bill of a family of four in the next fiscal year. As a counter to that expensive bill, President Carter last week recommended higher wheat subsidies and for the first time since the early 1970s offered corn and cotton subsidies to farmers who reduce plantings, which will surely raise food prices. There is no excuse for subsidies, despite some farmers' noisy threats of "strike." Farm prices have risen 13.9 percent since last September, and some food prices will shoot through the roof this spring because foul weather has badly hurt harvests of Soviet wheat and Brazilian soybeans.

REPEAL INFLATIONARY SPECIAL-INTEREST LAWS

The Jones Act, which requires all goods moving between U.S. ports to travel aboard high-cost U.S. ships, has many inflationary consequences, including raising the price of Alaskan oil shipped to the West and Gulf Coasts. The Davis-Bacon Act, a relic of the Depression, swells construction costs by requiring, in effect, that union wages must be paid on all federally aided projects.

HOLD BACK THE MINIMUM WAGE

It jumped from $2.30 to $2.65 last January and is scheduled to rise to $2.90 next January and $3.35 in 1981. Besides being inflationary, the increases discourage hiring of the unskilled and the young.

FREEZE EXECUTIVE PAY

Federal Reserve Chief G. William Miller, who took a cut from $400,000 to $57,500 when he left the chairmanship of Textron, recommends that "top business executives demonstrate their leadership in the fight by holding down their own compensation." A one-year moratorium on raises by people earning, say, $100,000 or more would not make much economic difference, but it might be worth something symbolically.

The weak and perilous course would be to surrender to inflation on the presumption that interest groups are just too strong and the nation's will is too weak to fight it. In fact, President Carter has given in to many of the constituencies, firing up inflation by calling for large jumps in welfare and urban spending, in farm subsidies and tariffs on imports as varied as sugar, TV sets and, just last week, CB radios. So long as the Administration appears to have round heels, self-seeking groups—from coal miners to steelmakers—will continue to press their inflationary desires.

The President has said that when he returns from his overseas trip this week, he will produce a comprehensive anti-inflation plan. His economic advisers urge him to take a tough stand by calling for a reduction of subsidies, regulations and the growth of spending. Clearly, the immediate risks would be outweighed by the ultimate rewards. If the U.S. reduces domestic inflation, the dollar will rise, import prices will decline, purchasing power will expand, interest rates will fall, housing will climb, profits will increase, the stock market will turn up, capital spending will swell, more jobs will be created and business will flourish. In sum, the small sacrifices made by special groups will lead to big benefits for all.

THIRTY YEARS LATER: THE GENOCIDE CONVENTION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the Genocide Convention is a treaty which would make the destruction, in whole or in part, of a racial, national, ethnic, or religious group a crime under international law. President Truman signed the treaty in 1948, and sent it to the Senate for ratification.

Today, some 30 years later, the treaty has yet to be acted upon by the Senate. It is a tragic irony that the one country famous throughout the world for its respect for human rights has yet to become a signatory of a treaty which seeks to guarantee the most basic of all human rights, the right to live. I feel that the Senate's inaction in this matter is a very serious oversight.

The United States has come a long way in 30 years. Thirty years ago, there were 147 million people in this country. Today there are more than 215 million people. The national budget has expanded greatly to meet the needs of a larger and more modern country. In 1948, our outlays were only $29 billion, and back then we even enjoyed a surplus of $12 billion. How things have changed. Today, the estimated outlays for next year are half a trillion dollars, more than 20 times as high as they were in 1948, and that $12 billion surplus has more than dwindled to a $60 billion deficit. The defense budget has shot from a little under $8 billion in 1948 to an estimated $117 billion for next year.

Why, Reggie Jackson, the prodigious Yankee slugger, was smaller than a baseball bat back then.

Presidents have changed, too. But every President since Truman has urged ratification of the Genocide Convention. Eisenhower, Kennedy, Johnson, Nixon, Ford, and most recently President Carter, have all given their support to the treaty.

And while the times have changed greatly, the need for the Genocide Convention is as real today as it was 30 years ago. Then, the memories of Nazi Germany were still fresh, and the horrible genocide which was carried out against the Jews stood as vivid proof of the need for such a treaty among nations. Today, the barbaric practices of Idi Amin and the Khmer Rouge illustrate that genocide still exists. I urge the Senate to ratify the Genocide Convention as soon as possible.

I hereby designate the Honorable JIM WRIGHT to act as Speaker pro tempore for today.

PRAYER

The Chaplain, Rev. Edward G. Latch, D.D., offered the following prayer:

Let not mercy and truth forsake you; bind them about your neck, write them on the tablet of your heart.—Proverbs 3: 3.

Spirit of life, in this new dawn,
Give us the faith that follows on,
Letting Thine all-pervading power
Fulfill the dream of this high hour.

Conscious of Your presence, our Father, and with the guidance of Your Spirit we face the tasks of this new week. Enable us so to commit our lives to You that we may have strength for daily duties and wisdom to serve our country with clear minds, warm hearts, and strong hands. Let not self-interest blind us to the higher good nor self-concern blot from our eyes the vision of truth nor self-seeking blur our concept of justice. Grant that we may have courage to stand up for the hard right lest we fall for the easy wrong.

Guided by You may our citizens live with good will for one another, may our Nation prosper, and may the nations get along together in peace. Amen.

REPORT OF PROGRESS TOWARD NEGOTIATED SETTLEMENT ON CYPRUS—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 95–308)

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, without objection, referred to the Committee on International Relations and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

As required by Public Law 94–104, this report describes the progress that has been made during the past sixty days towards a negotiated settlement on Cyprus.

In my last such report to the Congress, submitted on January 20, I outlined the continuing efforts that we and other nations have been making, in both bilateral and international meetings, to promote an early resumption of productive negotiations between the two Cypriot communities. I stressed that resolute action was still required, but still expressed the belief that we were moving in the right direction.

Since that time there have been developments of potential significance for Cyprus. Very shortly after his assumption of office on January 5, Turkish Prime Minister Ecevit publicly announced his intention to deal promptly and decisively with the outstanding foreign policy issues confronting his nation, prime among them being Cyprus. Ecevit acknowledged that a Cyprus settlement would be in Turkey's own best interests. "We want to see a rapid solution in Cyprus," he declared in a January 9 interview, "not because the U.S. or other friendly countries want it, but because it will be for the benefit of all Cyprus and for the benefit of peace in the region." Subsequently, in both public statements and private conversations, Prime Minister Ecevit said that he hoped negotiations between the communities would soon resume, and he declared that the Turkish side would submit concrete proposals on both the constitutional and territorial aspects of the issue.

United Nations Secretary General Waldheim visited Ankara, Athens and Nicosia between January 8 and 18. The Secretary General was apparently encouraged by his conversations with President Kyprianou, Prime Ministers Ecevit and Caramanlis, and Turkish Cypriot leader Denktash, and afterwards said that it might be possible to reconvene the stalled Cyprus intercommunal talks sometime early in the spring.

My Administration has welcomed Prime Minister Ecevit's declared intention to move forward on the Cyprus issue, and we have expressed our readiness to give full support to the initiatives of the Secretary General. Secretary Vance stopped in Ankara and Athens on January 20–22, following a visit to the Middle East, and held very useful discussions on a number of subjects, including Cyprus. The Secretary returned from these discussions convinced that both the governments of Turkey and Greece earnestly desired to work towards a Cyprus settlement.

The Turkish Cypriots, assisted by the Government of Turkey, are now preparing detailed constitutional and territorial proposals that could serve as a basis for resumed intercommunal negotiations. Our understanding is that these proposals may be completed sometime in March, and that negotiations between the two communities could be resumed by the Secretary General sometime thereafter. Toward that end, the Administration has recently urged the Turkish Cypriot leadership and the government of Turkey to develop proposals that are sufficiently substantive and forthcoming to form a basis for genuine negotiation. We have at the same time encouraged the Government of Cyprus to regard the new Turkish proposals, together with the proposals tabled by President Makarios last year, as a basis for initiating a round of intensive, good-faith negotiations which can lead to a narrowing of differences.

I strongly hope that productive Cyprus negotiations will be reconvened very soon. I am sure that all who wish to see peace, justice, and stability in Cyprus and in the eastern Mediterranean share this hope.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I have the honor to transmit herewith a sealed envelope from the White House, received in the Clerk's Office at 4:45 p.m. on Monday, March 27, 1978, and said to contain a message from the President on a comprehensive national urban policy.

COMPREHENSIVE NATIONAL URBAN POLICY—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES (H. DOC. NO. 95–309)

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, without objection, referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the State of the Union and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I submit today my proposals for a comprehensive national urban policy. These proposals set a policy framework for actions my Administration has already taken, for proposed new initiatives, and for our efforts to assist America's communities and their residents in the years to come. The policy represents a comprehensive, long-term commitment to the Nation's urban areas.

The urban policy I am announcing today will build a New Partnership involving all levels of government, the private sector, and neighborhood and voluntary organizations in a major effort to make America's cities better places in which to live and work. It is a comprehensive policy aimed both at making cities more healthy and improving the lives of the people who live in them.

The major proposals will:

Improve the effectiveness of existing Federal programs by coordinating these programs, simplifying planning requirements, reorienting resources, and reducing paperwork. And the proposals will make Federal actions more supportive of the urban policy effort and develop a process for analyzing the urban and community impact of all major Federal initiatives.

Provide employment opportunities, primarily in the private sector, to the long-term unemployed and the disadvantaged in cities. This will be done through a labor-intensive public works program and tax and other incentives for business to hire the long-term unemployed.

Provide fiscal relief to the most hard-pressed communities.

Provide strong incentives to attract private investment to distressed communities, including the creation of a National Development Bank, expanded grant programs and targeted tax incentives.

Encourage States to become partners in assisting urban areas through a new incentive grant program.

Stimulate greater involvement by neighborhood organizations and voluntary associations through funding neighborhood development projects and by creating an Urban Volunteer Corps. These efforts will be undertaken with the approval of local elected officials.

Increase access to opportunity for those disadvantaged by economic circumstance or a history of discrimination.

Provide additional social and health services to disadvantaged people in cities and communities.

Improve the urban physical environment and the cultural and aesthetic aspects of urban life by providing additional assistance for housing rehabilitation, mass transit, the arts, culture, parks and recreation facilities.

America's communities are an invaluable national asset. They are the center of our culture, the incubators of new ideas and inventions, the centers of commerce and finance, and the homes of our great museums, libraries and theatres. Cities contain trillions of dollars of public and private investments—investments which we must conserve, rehabilitate and fully use.

The New Partnership I am proposing today will focus the full energies of my Administration on a comprehensive, long-term effort. It will encourage States to redirect their own resources to support their urban areas more effectively. It will encourage local governments to streamline and coordinate their own activities. It will offer incentives to the private sector to make new investments in economically depressed communities. And it will involve citizens and neighborhood and voluntary organizations in meeting the economic and social needs of their communities.

The New Partnership will be guided by these principles:

Simplifying and improving programs and policy at all levels of government.

Combining the resources of Federal, State and local government, and using them as a lever to involve the even greater strength of our private economy to conserve and strengthen our cities and communities.

Being flexible enough to give help where it is most needed and to respond to the particular needs of each community.

Increasing access to opportunity for those disadvantaged by economic circumstances or history of discrimination.

And above all, drawing on the sense of community and voluntary effort that I believe is alive in America, and on the loyalty that Americans feel for their neighborhoods.

The need for a New Partnership is clear from the record of the last fifteen years. During the 1960's, the Federal government took a strong leadership role in responding to the problems of the cities. The Federal government attempted to identify the problems, develop the solutions and implement the programs. State and local governments and the private sector were not sufficiently involved. While many of these programs were successful, we learned an important lesson: that the Federal government alone has neither the resources nor the knowledge to solve all urban problems.

An equally important lesson emerged from the experience of the early 1970's. During this period, the Federal government retreated from its responsibilities, leaving States and localities with insufficient resources, interest or leadership to accomplish all that needed to be done. We learned that States and localities cannot solve the problems by themselves.

These experiences taught us that a successful urban policy must build a partnership that involves the leadership of the Federal government and the participation of all levels of government, the private sector, neighborhood and voluntary organizations and individual citizens.

PRIOR ACTIONS

The problems of our Nation's cities are complex and deep-seated. They have developed gradually over a generation as a result of private market and demographic forces and inadvertent government action; and the problems worsened markedly during the early 1970's.

These problems will not be solved immediately. They can be solved only by the long-term commitment which I offer today, and by the efforts of all levels of government, the private sector and neighborhood and voluntary organizations.

For my Administration, this commitment began on the day I took office and it will continue throughout my Presidency. With the cooperation of Congress, my Administration has already provided substantial increases in funding in many of the major urban assistance programs. Total assistance to State and local governments has increased by 25 percent, from $68 billion in FY 1977 to $85 billion in FY 1979. These increases are the direct result of actions we have taken during the past 14 months. They are as much a part of my Administration's urban policy as the initiatives which I am announcing today. Some of the most important programs have already been enacted into law or proposed to the Congress. These include:

A $2.7 billion increase over three years in the Community Development Block Grant Program, accompanied by a change in the formula to provide more assistance to the older and declining cities.

A $400 million a year Urban Development Action Grant Program providing assistance primarily to distressed cities.

An expansion of youth and training programs and an increase in the number of public service employment jobs, from 325,000 to 725,000. Expenditures for employment and training doubled from FY '77 to FY '79 to over $12 billion.

A $400 million private sector jobs proposal has been included in my proposal to reauthorize the CETA legislation. This initiative will encourage private businesses to hire the long-term unemployed and the disadvantaged.

A sixty-five percent increase in grants provided by the Economic Development Administration to urban areas.

A thirty percent increase in overall Federal assistance to education, including a $400 million increase in the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, targeted in substantial part to large city school systems with a concentration of children from low-income families.

An economic stimulus package enacted last year (Anti-recession Fiscal Assistance, Local Public Works and CETA) which provided almost $9 billion in additional aid to States and cities.

A welfare reform proposal which, upon passage, will provide immediate fiscal relief to State and local governments.

A doubling of outlays for the Section 312 housing rehabilitation loan program.

Creation of a consumer cooperative bank which would provide financing assistance to consumer cooperatives which have difficulty obtaining conventional financing.

IMPROVEMENT IN EXISTING PROGRAMS

The Administration's Urban and Regional Policy Group (URPG) has examined all of the major urban assistance programs and proposed improvements. It also has worked with agencies traditionally not involved in urban policy, such as the Defense Department, the General Services Administration, and the Environmental Protection Agency, and has developed proposals to make their actions more supportive of urban areas. As a result of this massive effort, the Federal government has become more sensitive to urban problems and more committed to their solutions.

The review of existing Federal programs has resulted in more than 150 improvements in existing programs. Most of these improvements can be undertaken immediately through administrative action. Some will require legislation. None will increase the Federal budget.

A few examples of the improvements are:

All agencies will develop goals and timetables for minority participation in their grants and contracts—five major agencies have already begun.

The Defense Department will set up a new program to increase procurement in urban areas.

EPA will modify its water and sewer program to discourage wasteful sprawl.

HUD has retargeted the Tandem Mortgage Assistance Program to provide greater support for urban housing.

The existing countercyclical fiscal assistance program will be retargeted to help governments with unemployment rates above the national average.

HUD and EDA are developing common planning and application requirements.

The General Services Administration will attempt to locate Federal facilities in cities whenever such a location is not inconsistent with the agency's mission.

The Department of Transportation has proposed legislation to consolidate many categories of urban highway and transit grants, and to standardize the local matching share. These steps will provide local governments with greater flexibility to develop transportation systems suited to their needs.

The Environmental Protection Agency will amend its regulations to accommodate new economic development in high pollution areas. Localities will be permitted to "bank" reductions in pollution which result from firms going out of business. These reductions then can be transferred to new firms locating in the community.

The effect of all these changes may be greater than even the substantial new initiatives which I have proposed in this message.

NEW INITIATIVES

The new initiatives which I am announcing today address five major urban needs:

1) Improving the operation of Federal, State and local governments.

2) Employment and Economic Developments.

3) Fiscal Assistance

4) Community and Human Development

5) Neighborhoods and Voluntary Associations

These initiatives require $4.4 billion in budget authority, $1.7 billion in new tax incentives, and $2.2 billion in guaranteed loan authority in FY 1979. For FY 1980 the budget authority will be $6.1 billion, the tax incentives $1.7 billion and the guaranteed loan authority $3.8 billion.

I. IMPROVING THE OPERATION OF FEDERAL, STATE AND LOCAL GOVERNMENTS

FEDERAL PROGRAMS

Over the long run, reorganization of the economic and community development programs may be necessary. Last June, I directed my reorganization project staff in the Office of Management and Budget to begin exploring the reorganization options. They have completed the first stages of this work. During the next several months, they will consult with the Congress, State and local officials and the public to develop the best solution.

There are several actions I will take immediately.

URBAN AND COMMUNITY IMPACT ANALYSIS

I am implementing a process through my Domestic Policy Staff (DPS) and Office of Management and Budget (OMB) to ensure that we do not inadvertently take actions which contradict the goals of the urban policy. Each agency submitting a major domestic initiative must include its own urban and community impact analysis. DPS and OMB will review these submissions and will ensure that any anti-urban impacts of proposed Federal policies will be brought to my attention.

INTERAGENCY COORDINATING COUNCIL

To improve program coordination, I will form an Interagency Coordinating Council, composed of the Assistant Secretaries with major program responsibilities in the key urban departments. The Council will have two functions:

It will serve as a catalyst for operational improvements which cut across Departments (for example, instituting uniform grant applications); and it will encourage interagency cooperation on projects which are too large or too complex to be funded by one agency. This Council will, for the first time, provide a coordinated Federal response to communities which develop comprehensive and multi-year projects. It will have direction from the Executive Office of the President.

CONSOLIDATING PLANNING REQUIREMENTS AND OTHER MANAGEMENT IMPROVEMENTS

We soon will announce the consolidation of intragency planning requirements. I have asked the Director of the Office of Management and Budget to direct an interagency task force to improve the management of Federal grant-in-aid programs and consolidate the numerous planning requirements in the community and economic development grant programs.

IMPROVED DATA AND INFORMATION

I have asked the Secretary of Commerce, in her capacity as Chair of the Statistical Policy Coordination Committee, to design an improved urban data and information system. At the present time much of this data is inadequate or out of date.

THE ROLE OF STATE GOVERNMENTS

State government policies, even more than Federal policies, are important to the fiscal and economic health of cities. States affect their cities in a number of ways, including setting taxation and annexation powers, determining the placement of major development investments and apportioning the financial responsibility for welfare and education expenditures.

The Federal government has little or no control over these developments, all of which clearly affect the economic and fiscal health of cities and communities.

These State responsibilities underscore the need for an urban policy which includes the States as full and equal partners. The effectiveness of our urban policy will be enhanced if the States can be encouraged to complement the Federal effort.

To encourage States to support their urban areas, I will offer a new program of State incentive grants. These grants will be provided, on a discretionary basis, to States which adopt approved plans to help their cities and communities. The plans must be developed with the participation and approval of communities within the State. The grants will be provided to the States to finance a portion of the plan. The State Incentive Grant Program will be administered by HUD and will provide $400 million over two years.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT ROLE

Many communities and cities can improve management and planning improvements by reforming fiscal management practices, streamlining local regulatory procedures, and coordinating local community and economic development activities.

The Federal government provides planning and technical assistance to communities through HUD and Commerce to help cities improve their management and planning practices. These funds will be used increasingly to build the local governments' capacity to undertake the necessary fiscal and management reforms.

The Federal government will offer special consideration in discretionary programs to cities which achieve coordinated action at the local level.

II. EMPLOYMENT AND ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

There is a serious shortage of jobs for many residents of our urban areas and a lack of investment to build the tax base of our cities.

The urban policy will address this issue in two ways.

In the short run, it wil provide additional employment opportunities through a labor-intensive public works program, a targeted employment tax credit, and a private sector training and jobs initiative to encourage businesses to hire the hard-core unemployment, together with the extensions I have already proposed in employment and training opportunities under the CETA Act.

In the long run, the policy attempts to rebuild the private sector economic base of these communities through a National Development Bank, a special tax incentive, an increase in economic development grants and other incentives.

LABOR-INTENSIVE PUBLIC WORKS

I ask Congress for $1 billion a year for a program of labor-intensive public works, targeted on communities with high unemployment. Half of the estimated 60,000 full-time equivalent jobs created annually by this program will be reserved for the disadvantaged and the long-term unemployed. These workers will be paid at Davis-Bacon trainee wage levels.

This program will enable cities to make needed repairs on buildings, streets, parks, and other public facilities.

In contrast to the Local Public Works program—which involves projects requiring large equipment, material expenditures and a prolonged planning period—more of the funds under this labor-intensive program will go to job creation.

TARGETED EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDIT

I also propose a Targeted Employment Tax Credit to encourage business to hire disadvantaged young workers between the ages of 18 and 24 who suffer the highest unemployment rates in the Nation.

Under my proposal, private employers of young and disadvantaged, or handicapped, workers would be entitled to claim a $2,000 tax credit for each eligible worker during the first year of employment and a $1,500 credit for each eligible worker during the second year.

I am proposing this Targeted Employment Tax Credit as a substitute for the expiring Employment Tax Credit. The current program costs $2.5 billion a year and has had little influence on hiring decisions. The Administration's targeted program will cost approximately $1.5 billion a year, with far greater impact.

LOCATION OF FEDERAL FACILITIES

I will sign a new Executive Order directing the General Services Administration to give first priority to cities in locating new Federal facilities or consolidating or relocating existing facilities. Under my Administration, Federal facilities will be located in cities, unless such a location is inconsistent with the agency's mission.

Federal buildings and facilities can be an important source of jobs and of rental payments and, in many cities, a principal stabilizing force preventing decline.

The Federal government should set an example for the private sector to invest in urban areas.

FEDERAL GOVERNMENT PROCUREMENT

To assure that Federal procurement is used to strengthen the economic base of our Nation's cities and communities, I will:

Strengthen the implementation of the existing procurement set-aside program for labor surplus areas, by directing the General Services Administration to work with each agency to develop specific procurement targets and to monitor their implementation. GSA will report to me every six months on the progress of each Agency;

Direct the Defense Department to implement an experimental program to target more of its procurement to high unemployment areas.

NATIONAL DEVELOPMENT BANK

I propose the creation of a National Development Bank, which would encourage businesses to locate or expand in economically distressed urban and rural areas. The Bank would be authorized to guarantee investments totaling $11 billion through 1981.

To lower operating costs in urban areas, the Bank would provide long-term, low-cost financing which, in conjunction with expanded grant programs administered by HUD and EDA, will reduce a firm's financing costs by up to 60 percent.

The Bank uses four major financing tools:

Grants of up to 15 percent of a firm's total capital cost, to a maximum $3 million, for fixed assets of a project. The grants, which would be made under expanded EDA and HUD authorities, would cover expenditures for land assembly, site preparation, rehabilitation, and equipment.

Loan guarantees, provided by the Bank to cover three-quarters of the remaining capital costs up to a maximum of $15 million per project. The Bank could, at its discretion, reduce the interest rate down to two and one-half percent for particularly desirable projects. Bank financing would be conditioned on obtaining 21 percent of the project's total costs from private lenders.

The ceiling for industrial reserve bonds in economically distressed areas would be increased from $5 to $20 million with the approval of the Bank. A business which used this financing for a project could also receive a grant.

The Bank also will provide a secondary loan market for private loans in eligible areas to finance capital expenditures. This will be particularly beneficial to small businesses.

Bank projects will require the approval of State or local government economic development entities, which would be responsible to the elected local leadership. Distressed urban and rural areas would be eligible. Additional employment would be a key test of project eligibility.

The Bank will be an interagency corporation, governed by a Board composed of the Secretaries of HUD, Commerce and the Treasury. This will ensure coordination between the major economic, community development and urban finance agencies of the government.

The Office of Management and Budget is currently assessing the organization of the Federal economic and community development activities. The Bank will function on an interagency basis pending recommendations in this area.

ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT GRANTS

I propose substantial increases of $275 million each in the UDAG grant program and the EDA Title IX program. These increases will be used in conjunction with the financing incentives available from the National Development Bank.

Taken together these major increases will help leverage substantial new private sector investment in urban areas and address the long-term economic deterioration experienced by certain urban and rural areas.

DIFFERENTIAL INVESTMENT TAX CREDIT

I propose that firms that locate or expand in economically distressed areas be eligible for a differential 5 percent investment tax credit, to a total of 15 percent for both structures and equipment. The credit would be available only to firms awarded "Certificates of Necessity" by the Commerce Department based on financing need and employment potential.

Commerce will be authorized to issue up to $200 million in certificates for each of the next two years.

AIR QUALITY PLANNING GRANTS

I propose a $25 million planning grant program to help cities and communities comply with the Clean Air Act without limiting severely new, private sector investment within their areas.

I have also asked EPA, HUD and EDA to provide technical assistance to help local governments reconcile potential conflicts between air pollution and economic development goals.

MINORITY BUSINESS

Minority businesses are a critical part of the private sector economic base of many cities, communities and neighborhoods, and provide important employment opportunities to city residents.

I propose today two important initiatives which will increase the role of minority businesses in our economy. First, in comparison with FY 1977 levels, we will triple Federal procurement from minority businesses by the end of FY 1979—an increase over our earlier commitment to double minority procurement.

In addition, I intend to ask all Federal agencies to include goals for minority business participation in their contract and grant-in-aid programs. Five agencies—HUD, Commerce, EPA, Interior and DOT—already have proposed improvements in minority business programs. These programs all build on our successful experience with the Local Public Works Program.

Finally, I intend to facilitate greater interaction between the minority business community and the leaders of our Nation's largest corporations.

COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT CORPORATIONS

I propose that an additional $20 million be appropriated to the Community Services Administration as venture capital for the most effective Community Development Corporations. This assistance will help them have a substantial impact on their designated areas.

The funding will be made available for projects that receive support from local elected officials, involve leveraging private sector funds and are coordinated with HUD, EDA or the Small Business Administration.

ROLE OF PRIVATE FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS

An effective urban strategy must involve private financial institutions. I am asking the independent financial regulatory agencies to develop appropriate actions, consistent with safe, sound and prudent lending practices, to encourage financial institutions to play a greater role in meeting the credit needs of their communities.

First, I am requesting that financial regulatory agencies determine what further actions are necessary to halt the practice of redlining—the refusal to extend credit without a sound economic justification. I will encourage those agencies to develop strong, consistent and effective regulations to implement the Community Reinvestment Act.

Second, I propose the creation of an Institute for Community Investment, under the Federal Home Loan Bank Board. The Institute will bring together appraisers, realtors, lenders, building and insurance companies to develop a consistent approach toward urban lending and to train urban lending specialists.

Third, I propose a pilot program to create Neighborhood Commercial Reinvestment Centers under the Comptroller of the Currency. This proposal is an adaptation of the highly successful Urban Reinvestment Task Force housing credit concept to the commercial credit area. Neighborhood Commercial Reinvestment Centers will be local organizations, comprised of merchants and neighborhood residents, local government officials, and commercial banks which will provide business credit in urban neighborhoods. SBA, EDA, and HUD will work with the financial regulatory agencies to revitalize specific commercial areas.

Finally, I have asked the Secretary of Housing and Urban Development to chair an interagency task force to evaluate the availability of credit in urban areas and recommend appropriate further action. I have asked the task force to examine and make recommendations with respect to the following areas:

The availability of mortgage and commercial credit in urban areas, and the impacts of the activities of Federal agencies on such credit;

Existing mortgage insurance, casualty insurance and business credit insurance programs;

The full range of urban credit and insurance risk reduction techniques.

III. FISCAL ASSISTANCE

While the fiscal condition of many State and local governments has improved dramatically over the last three years, many cities and communities still are experiencing severe problems. These cities and communities require fiscal assistance from the Federal government, if they are to avoid severe service cutbacks or tax increases.

SUPPLEMENTAL FISCAL ASSISTANCE

Cities and communities currently receive fiscal assistance through the Anti-Recession Fiscal Assistance Act (ARFA), which expires on September 30, 1978. This program has been an effective tool for helping States and local governments withstand the fiscal impact of high unemployment.

Current unemployment projections, however, suggest that even if the ARFA program were extended in its current form, it would phase out by mid-FY 1979, when unemployment is expected to drop below six percent. If the program is permitted to phase out, many cities and communities will experience severe fiscal strain.

I propose today that ARFA be replaced with a Supplemental Fiscal Assistance Program, which will provide $1 billion of fiscal assistance annually for the next two fiscal years to local governments experiencing significant fiscal strain. Further extension of this program will be considered together with General Revenue Sharing.

FISCAL RELIEF IN WELFARE PROPOSAL

In addition, I propose to phase in the fiscal relief component of the Better Jobs and Income Act as soon as Congress passes this legislation, rather than in 1981 as originally planned.

IV. COMMUNITY AND HUMAN DEVELOPMENT

A comprehensive program to revitalize America's cities must provide for community and human needs. This involves both physical facilities, such as parks, recreation facilities, housing and transportation systems, and the provision of health and social services.

HOUSING REHABILITATION

The conservation and upgrading of our housing stock is important to maintaining the strength of urban areas. Housing rehabilitation improves the quality of community life and provides construction jobs in areas of high unemployment.

I propose an additional $150 million in fiscal year 1979 for the section 312 rehabilitation loan program, which will more than double the existing program. This expanded effort will permit the rehabilitation of small multi-family housing projects in distressed neighborhoods.

URBAN TRANSPORTATION

In many cities, public transportation is inadequately financed. The Federal government has begun to make substantial investments to rehabilitate, revitalize and construct urban transportation systems.

I have already submitted to Congress my proposals to extend and strengthen the highway and mass transit programs.

To supplement these efforts I today propose an additional $200 million for capital investments in intermodal urban transportation projects. These funds will be used to link existing transportation facilities in selected cities.

RESOURCE RECOVERY PLANNING

Solid waste disposal is a growing problem in the many urban areas which face a shortage of landfill sites. At the same time, techniques to recover valuable resources and energy from solid waste have emerged.

I will request $15 million for the EPA to provide grants of $300,000 to $400,000 to cities for feasibility studies of solid waste recovery systems.

ARTS AND CULTURE

Cities are centers of culture and art, which thrive on the vitality of the urban environment.

To help renew and develop this artistic and cultural spirit, I propose a new Livable Cities program administered by the Department of Housing and Urban Development, with the participation of the National Endowment for the Arts. This program will provide up to $20 million in grants to States and communities for neighborhood- and community-based arts programs, urban design and planning, and the creation and display of art in public spaces. Historic preservation of buildings should also be encouraged.

URBAN PARKS AND RECREATION

The quality of life in urban areas is critically affected by the availability of open spaces and recreation facilities. Yet hard pressed communities often lack the resources to maintain and invest adequately in these amenities.

To address this problem, I propose a major new Federal grant program. Urban communities will compete for funds to revive and rebuild parks and recreation facilities. Challenge grants totaling $150 million will be provided for construction and major rehabilitation of urban recreation systems, such as parks, tennis and basketball courts, swimming pools, bicycle paths, and other facilities. Cities will be awarded grants based on the quality of their planning, the degree of need and their ability to match the Federal funds with private and local contributions.

SOCIAL SERVICES

Urban revitalization efforts must be accompanied by efforts to help those in need to improve their own lives. A variety of income support and social services programs are designed to do this. Since 1974, however, the support given to State social service programs by the Federal Government has declined in real terms.

I propose an additional $150 million of new budget authority for the Title XX program. These funds will be used to improve the delivery of social services in urban areas—ranging from Meals on Wheels for the elderly to day care for children of working mothers—and to develop greater coordination between local, public and private agencies.

HEALTH SERVICES

Nearly 50 million Americans live in areas without adequate health services. These areas, many of which are in inner cities, suffer from higher infant mortality rates, greater poverty and shortages of health care personnel.

In underserved areas, emergency room and outpatient departments of city hospitals are used as the routine source of medical care by the poor, primarily due to the lack of private physicians. As these departments were not designed to provide comprehensive medical care, the hospital resources are strained and the poor often go without adequate care.

To help meet the primary health care needs of the urban poor and reduce the strain on city hospitals, I propose to expand federally-supported Community Health Centers and to fund city-sponsored programs which provide comprehensive, but less costly, primary care services. The city-sponsored programs will enroll the medically indigent in existing health systems, such as HMOs. They also will help expand locally-supported centers, reform hospital outpatient departments and provide comprehensive health services.

EDUCATION

Schools are the focus of community activities in many places. Yet they are seldom fully used or linked to other community and social services.

I intend to provide $1.5 million to expand the experimental Cities in Schools program which seeks to bridge the gap by uniting a number of social services within schools to better serve both students and their families. We intend to expand this promising new program to 10 pilot schools.

In addition, I urge the Congress to enact the $600 million increase in the Title I program of the Elementary and Secondary Education Act, which I recently proposed, including my recommendation that $400 million of these funds be targeted to cities and other areas with high concentrations of low-income families.

V. NEIGHBORHOODS AND VOLUNTEER ORGANIZATIONS

No resource of our urban communities is more valuable than the commitment of our citizens.

Volunteer groups, which gain strength from the selfless efforts of many individuals, make an indispensable contribution to their cities.

URBAN VOLUNTEER CORPS

I propose a $40 million program in ACTION to increase the effectiveness of voluntary activities at the local level. With the agreement of local government, the program will create a corps of volunteers at the local level and match their skills with the needs of local governments and community and neighborhood organizations.

It also will provide small grants averaging $5,000 for voluntary improvement and beautification projects.

ACTION would select, with the concurrence of local government, a lead agency in each city to administer the Urban Volunteer Corps.

SELF-HELP DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

Neighborhood associations are playing a key role in housing and neighborhood revitalization. We must strengthen that role.

I will request $15 million in FY 1979 for a self-help development program to be administered by the Office for Neighborhoods in HUD.

This new program will provide funds for specific housing and revitalization projects in poor and low-income areas. Each project would involve the participation of local residents, the private sector and local government and would require the concurrence of the mayor.

CRIME PREVENTION

Street crime is a serious problem in America's cities and communities. Over the last few years a number of promising initiatives have been undertaken by community groups and local law enforcement agencies to combat street crime. Escort services for the elderly, centers to help the victims of crime, and neighborhood watchers are examples of promising developments.

I propose a program which will add $10 million in new resources to existing efforts in the Law Enforcement Assistance Administration for a program operated jointly by ACTION and LEAA. Under this program, mayors and local neighborhood groups will develop community crime prevention programs based on successful pilot models. My reorganization proposals for LEAA and the legislation I will submit to extend the Law Enforcement Assistance Act will strengthen our efforts at crime prevention.

COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT CREDIT UNIONS

Some urban communities are not served by any financial institutions. Community Development Credit Unions address this problem by investing their assets in the communities in which they are established. This type of credit union was first established under the poverty programs in the 1960's. About 225 exist today, and many are the only financial institutions in their communities.

I am proposing a $12 million program to provide $200,000 seed capital for new Community Development Credit Unions, to provide them with an operating subsidy for staff, training and technical assistance.

The job of revitalizing the urban communities of our country will not be done overnight. Problems which have accumulated gradually over generations cannot be solved in a year or even in the term of a President.

But I believe that a New Partnership—bringing together in a common effort all who have a stake in the future of our communities—can bring us closer to our long-term goals. We can make America's cities more attractive places in which to live and work; we can help the people of urban America lead happier and more useful lives. But we can only do it together.

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, without objection, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed with illustrations:

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the District of Columbia Self-Government and Governmental Reorganization Act, I am transmitting for your consideration the budget of the District of Columbia for fiscal year 1979.

THE WHITE HOUSE, March 27, 1978.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House of Representatives:

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
March 27, 1978.

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
The Speaker, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I have the honor to transmit herewith a sealed envelope from the White House, received in the Clerk's Office at 4:45 p.m. on Monday March 27, 1978, and said to contain a message from the President wherein he transmits the 1975 Annual Report of Health Activities under the Federal Coal Mine Health and Safety Act of 1969.

With kind regards, I am,
Sincerely,

EDMUND L. HENSHAW, Jr.,
Clerk, House of Representatives.
By W. RAYMOND COLLEY,
Deputy Clerk.

1975 ANNUAL REPORT OF HEALTH ACTIVITIES UNDER FEDERAL COAL MINE HEALTH AND SAFETY ACT OF 1969—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, without objection, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Education and Labor:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith the 1975 Annual Report of Health Activities under the Federal Coal Mine Health and Safety Act of 1969.

I recommend that the statutory reporting requirement for this report be changed from once every year to once every three years. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare staff resources and time could be better spent on more research rather than on the preparation of annual reports of largely repetitious material. Basic information in this field has been known for some time, and new findings develop only slowly and infrequently. All of the information contained in this report is available to Congress during annual appropriations and oversight hearings, and the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare will inform Congress immediately of any scientific breakthroughs in the field.

JIMMY CARTER.

COMMUNICATION FROM THE CLERK OF THE HOUSE

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following communication from the Clerk of the House of Representatives:

WASHINGTON, D.C.,

Hon. THOMAS P. O'NEILL, Jr.,
The Speaker, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I have the honor to transmit herewith a sealed envelope from the White House, received in the Clerk's Office at 4:45 p.m. on Monday, March 27, 1978, and said to contain a message from the President wherein he transmits the Sixth Annual Report on the Status of Federal Advisory Committees.

With kind regards, I am
Sincerely,

EDMUND L. HENSHAW, Jr.,

By W. RAYMOND COLLEY,
Deputy Clerk.

SIXTH ANNUAL REPORT ON THE STATUS OF FEDERAL ADVISORY COMMITTEES—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and without objection, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Government Operations:

To the Congress of the United States:

In accordance with the provisions of Section 6(c) of the Federal Advisory Committee Act, I am transmitting the sixth annual report on the status of Advisory Committees.

This report reflects the results of the 1977 governmentwide, zero-base review that I directed be conducted of all advisory committees:

—The total number of committees was reduced to 875 from 1,159 at the end of 1976.

—While some new committees were established during the year, some 333 committees were terminated, and the number was reduced further by 81 as the result of the consolidation of existing committees.

While we recognize the contributions that advisory committees can make, we will continue our efforts to assure, through careful management and review, that such committees are terminated when they no longer are necessary, and that new committees are established only when they are essential to meet the responsibilities of the Government.

ANNUAL REPORT OF CORPORATION FOR PUBLIC BROADCASTING FOR 1977—MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER pro tempore laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States; which was read and, without objection, together with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce:

To the Congress of the United States:

Enclosed is the "Annual Report of the Corporation for Public Broadcasting for FY 1977," prepared in accordance with the requirement of Section 396(i) of the Public Broadcasting Act of 1967 (Public Law 90-129) as amended.

The Corporation has again prepared a thoughtful report which highlights its efforts for the past fiscal year. The accomplishments of public broadcasting are well articulated with emphasis on television and radio programming, technological innovation, and human development services.

It should be noted that the projections of long range Federal financial contributions from the Federal Government exceed levels contained in the Administration's legislative proposal to reauthorize the Corporation for the period FY 1981–85.

The Annual Report is being forwarded so that it is available to the Congress for its deliberations.

ADDITION TO LEGISLATIVE PROGRAM FOR APRIL 4

Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, I wish at this time to announce the addition of two more bills to be considered by the House under suspension of the rules tomorrow, April 4.

Those bills are:

H.R. 11567. SEC authorizations fiscal year 1979–81; and

H.R. 11232. Standard Reference Data Act authorization.

CONSENT CALENDAR

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This is Consent Calendar Day. The Clerk will call the first bill on the Consent Calendar.

AUTHORIZING RETIREMENT OF CERTAIN RESERVE ENLISTED MEMBERS AFTER 20 YEARS OF ACTIVE DUTY

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 10341) to amend title 10, United States Code, to authorize enlitsed members of the Army and the Air Force to retire with 20 years of service.

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

RECALCULATING THE RETIRED PAY OF CERTAIN SENIOR ENLISTED ADVISERS OF THE MARINE CORPS

The Clerk called the bill (H.R. 10343) to provide for recalculation of the retired pay of individuals who served as sergeant major of the Marine Corps before December 16, 1967.

Ms. MIKULSKI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the bill be passed without prejudice.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentlewoman from Maryland?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That concludes the call of the eligible bills on the Consent Calendar.

SEVERE SENTENCES AGAINST UKRAINIAN HELSINKI WATCHERS

(Mr. FASCELL asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. FASCELL. Mr. Speaker, last Wednesday, on March 29, 1978, the Soviet authorities sentenced both Mykola Matusevych and Myroslav Marynovych, founding members of the Ukrainian Helsinki Watch Group, to stiff penalties: 7 years in labor camp and 5 years of internal exile for "anti-Soviet agitation." Marynovych and Matusevych have already spent 11 months in total isolation since they were arrested on April 23, 1977.

Their isolation continued even during the trial—neither family nor friends were admitted to the courtroom in the village of Vasilkiv near Kiev. As a mark of protest at the illegality of the proceedings, Matusevych refused to testify and therefore was taken from the courtroom.

Mykola Matusevych, a Kiev resident, was prevented from completing his education because of his political views and was once jailed for 15 days for taking part in traditional Christmas caroling. He has also been dismissed from work several times for defending political prisoners and has supported himself by working at odd jobs.

Myroslav Marynovych, an electrical engineer by profession, comes from the village of Kalynivka in the Kiev region. Reportedly, he was thrice dismissed from jobs for associating with dissidents and for expressing nonconformist views. Most recently, he was employed as an editor at a publishing house.

The fate of Marynovych and Matusevych has long been of concern to Soviet dissidents such as Gen. Pyotr Grigorenko. He feared that the Soviet authorities would deal with their case with particular severity due to their relative youth—Matusevych is 31 and Marynovych is 28—and because they are natives of the Western Ukraine, an area from which activists are always treated with special harshness.

Partly because rumors were circulated that the two men had been released, their case has received little attention in the West. I protest in the strongest terms this blatant violation of the Helsinki accords which the sentences of Mykola Matusevych and Myroslav Marynovych represent.

PROPOSED LIFTING OF EMBARGO AGAINST TURKEY IS SHATTERING

(Mr. BIAGGI asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, the proposal by the administration to lift the arms embargo against Turkey is shattering. It is a proposal which in effect sanctions the illegality and immorality of Turkey's position on Cyprus at the expense of jeopardizing our relations with the people of Greece and Cyprus.

The fact is—the illegality and immorality continue undiminished. Turkey which illegally invaded Cyprus in 1974 with American weapons continues to this day to unlawfully occupy more than 40 percent of the island. Turkey's occupation has resulted in tens of thousands of Greek-Cypriots being made refugees in their own land. In addition, families and friends have been separated and more than 2,000 Greek Cypriots remain missing since the invasion.

Turkey if in good faith could have sought a resolution of this unlawful occupation. They have had 4 years to demonstrate their good faith. In the continuing absence of such a commitment it is intolerable that this administration would even suggest a change in the embargo.

To pursue lifting the embargo under these conditions would thwart the will of the people as reflected by the votes in Congress to impose the embargo. Moreover it would endanger our favorable relations with the people of Cyprus and Greece. Can we not expect their friendship to turn to hostility because of our abandonment and betrayal? How will it impact on the rest of the world? Will our allies feel that they would be similarly treated?

America's credibility is at stake. The question of human rights on the tiny island of Cyprus is our current concern. However the conduct of the United States will reverberate unfavorably throughout the world if we again compromise our commitment to adherence to human rights by all nations. History will record this event as being less than our most shining hour.

THE LATE HONORABLE J. HARDIN PETERSON

(Mr. SIKES asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, it is my sad duty to inform the Members of the House of the death of the Honorable J. Hardin Peterson on March 28, 1978.

Former Congressman Peterson served in this body for 18 years and they were 18 years of truly distinguished and outstanding service. He retired in 1950 at which time he was the chairman of the Committee on Public Lands. He also held other important committee assignments in the House.

Those Members who served with him, as I did, remember that he was one of the most highly respected, one of the most genuinely loved and admired Members of the House. His contributions to our Nation were indeed significant and important.

My deep and earnest sympathies are extended to his beloved wife Christine, to his son J. Hardin Peterson, Jr., and his daughter, Mrs. Ann Myers.

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SIKES. I yield to my distinguished friend and colleague, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. GIBBONS).

Mr. GIBBONS. Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the distinguished dean of the Florida delegation (Mr. SIKES) yielding to me at this time.

The late Honorable J. Hardin Peterson was a distinguished Member of this body. He was a fine public servant. He was widely loved. I remember all of the fine work that he did here in the Congress, the work that he did to help the congressional district that I am now privileged to represent. Much of the progress that has been made in that area extends back to the fine work of J. Hardin Peterson.

Mr. Speaker, it now takes at least six of us to fill or attempt to fill his shoes in the district he once represented. That is indeed a tribute to the fine work he did.

Mr. Speaker, on behalf of Mrs. Gibbons and myself I want to extend our deepest sympathy to his family, particularly his wife Christine, to his son, J. Hardin Peterson, and to his daughter, Ann Myers who are friends of ours and we love them. We extend them our deepest sympathy.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to comment on the services of our former colleague, the late Honorable J. Hardin Peterson.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Florida?

There was no objection.

GIFTS TO CONGRESSMEN

(Mr. EDWARDS of Oklahoma asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. EDWARDS of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, yesterday when I returned to my office after the work period in my congressional district, I found on my desk a brightly colored gift-wrapped package. Not knowing what was in it, I opened it and found, to my surprise, and not to my enjoyment, a canned ham presented to me for some unknown reason by a corporation in Texas, the LTV Corp., with which I have no relations, and never have had, from an officer of that corporation whom I have never met.

Each Member of the Congress has the right, of course, to make his own decision about such things but I for one wish people would stop giving me gifts because I am getting tired of spending the money to send them back.

SOCIAL SECURITY

(Mr. BURKE of Massachusetts asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. BURKE of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, I want to bring to the attention of my colleagues an article by Spencer Rich which apeared in the Washington Post on Saturday, April 1, 1978. The article contains many inaccuracies and omissions concerning social security in nations throughout the world.

Mr. Rich does not seem to think that the additional $227 billion in social security taxes over the next 10 years will have any impact on the economy. In fact, the Joint Economic Committee has estimated that this increasing social security tax will result in the lost of at least 1.3 million jobs. This reduction in jobs will result in a loss of $15 to $20 billion in general revenues in 1 year.

Over 60 nations throughout the world use general revenues for a portion of their social security. The United States is the only country I know of with a 50-percent tax on the employer and employee, each. The U.S. employers pay more social security taxes per worker than any of our competitive nations—$1,500 more per worker in the steel industry $1,200 more per worker in the auto industry, $1,100 more per worker in the electronics industry, $700 more per worker in the textile and footwear industries.

The social security taxes enacted in 1977 will have a crippling effect on the economy, putting more people out of work, and forcing more and more businesses, including newspapers, to close.

The people of this Nation deserve more thorough reporting from the members of the press.

Biased reporting has no place on a subject affecting over 140 million Americans.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Today is the day for the Suspension Calendar, and pursuant to the provisions of clause 3(b) of rule XXVII, the Chair announces that he will postpone further proceedings today on each motion to suspend the rules on which a recorded vote or the yeas and nays are ordered, or on which the vote is objected to under clause 4 of rule XV.

After all motions to suspend the rules have been entertained and debated and after those motions to be determined by nonrecord votes have been disposed of, the Chair will then put the question on each motion on which the further proceedings were postponed.

FRIENDSHIP HILL NATIONAL HISTORIC SITE

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 10984) to provide for the establishment of the Friendship Hill National Historic Site in the State of Pennsylvania, and for other purposes, as amended.

H.R. 10984

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That in order to preserve and commemorate for the benefit and enjoyment of present and future generations an area of unique historical significance associated with the Jeffersonian Period of American history, the Secretary of the Interior (hereinafter referred to as the "Secretary") is authorized to establish the Friendship Hill National Historic Site in the State of Pennsylvania, including the former home of Albert Gallatin, as depicted on the map entitled "FRHI 80000" dated February 1978. Said map shall be on file and available for public inspection in the offices of the Director, National Park Service, Washington, District of Columbia. The Secretary is authorized to acquire such land and improvements thereon by donation, purchase with donated or appropriated funds or exchange.

SEC. 2. Pending establishment of the site and thereafter the Secretary shall administer property acquired pursuant to this Act in accordance with the Act of August 25, 1916 (39 Stat. 535; 16 U.S.C. 1, 2–4), as amended and supplemented, and the Act of August 21, 1935 (49 Stat. 666; 16 U.S.C. 461–467), as amended.

SEC. 3. (a) There are hereby authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, and for succeeding fiscal years, such sums as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act.

(b) For the development of essential facilities there are authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, and for succeeding fiscal years, such sums as may be necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act, but not to exceed $100,000. Within three years from the effective date of this Act, the Secretary shall develop and transmit to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives and to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the Senate a general management plan for the use and development of the site consistent with the purposes of this Act, indicating—

(1) the lands and interests in lands adjacent or related to the site which are deemed necessary or desirable for the purposes of resource protection, scenic integrity or management and administration of the area in furtherance of the purposes of this Act and the estimated cost thereof;

(2) the number of visitors and types of public use within the site which can be accommodated in accordance with the protection of its resources; and

(3) the location and estimated cost of facilities deemed necessary to accommodate such visitors and uses.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. SEBELIUS. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California (Mr. PHILLIP BURTON) and the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. SEBELIUS) will be recognized for 20 minutes each.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California (Mr. PHILLIP BURTON).

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 10984, as introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MURPHY) and reported by the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs, authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to establish a Friendship Hill National Historic Site in Fayette County, Pa.

Mr. Speaker, the historic site will preserve the home and commemorate the life of Albert Gallatin, Secretary of the Treasury during the Presidency of Thomas Jefferson.

The proposed national historic site includes the original residence which Gallatin had constructed in 1789, and which was enlarged in 1823. Some 700 acres of land are in the current tract which would be acquired for management by the National Park Service. The residence and its associated structures have been little altered from the time of Gallatin's ownership. The estate borders the Monongahela River and retains its pastoral character.

Albert Gallatin was born in Switzerland in 1761, and emigrated to this country while still a youth. He settled in Pennsylvania, and was elected to the U.S. House of Representatives in 1795. Thomas Jefferson appointed Gallatin as Secretary of the Treasury in 1801. During the War of 1812, Gallatin became the principal negotiator for the United States in the discussions that resulted in the Treaty of Ghent. He then served as minister to France, and later as minister to Great Britain.

Friendship Hill National Historic Site would interpret not only Gallatin's own life, but also that of the political and social development of the United States during the first several decades following independence. Friendship Hill is therefore important not only for its association with this early American statesman, but also for the opportunity it can provide to further understanding of the Jeffersonian period of history.

Mr. SEBELIUS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, this bill establishes the home of Albert Gallatin, a former Secretary of the Treasury and influential statesman during the early years of our democracy, as the Friendship Hill National Historic Site in Pennsylvania. Located on nearly 700 acres of pastoral landscape bordering the Monongahela River, the original residence constructed by Gallatin in 1789 has had little serious alteration.

Gallatin made numerous major contributions to the development of our Nation, serving in the House of Representatives, as a principal U.S. negotiator in the War of 1812, and as minister to both France and Great Britain. He also was the founder of the Ethnelogical Society of America, and became its first president.

It is also important to note, Mr. Speaker, that a year and a half ago, the Congress enacted a provision of law directing the Secretary of the Interior to conduct studies, and from them to assemble a list annually of not less than 12 areas which he believes may possess national significance and may be worthy of addition to the National Park System. The list was to be prioritized, considering among other factors, impending resource threat and cost escalation factors, and submitted to the Congress annually. Friendship Hill was the very first item entered on that list, and I am pleased to see the House able to act so expeditiously on this item.

Mr. Speaker, I urge approval on this bill.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, at this time I yield such time as he may consume to our distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. AUSTIN MURPHY.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. MURPHY) has given this legislation remarkable leadership. I think he deserves the commendation of all of us for his diligence in pursuing this matter and in assuring that this valuable resource will be kept for future generations.

Mr. MURPHY of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding, and I appreciate the remarks of my subcommittee chairman.

Mr. Speaker, as sponsor of H.R. 10984, I would like to take this opportunity to relate to my colleagues my views on this matter and why I desire to see Friendship Hill, the home of Albert Gallatin, included in our national park system.

Mr. Speaker, as the Members are aware, Albert Gallatin's place in the history of our country was in various positions. He served as a U.S. Congressman, as Secretary of the Treasury under Presidents Jefferson and Madison, as head of the peace mission to Russia in 1813, and in 1815 he was the chief of the U.S. diplomats at the Treaty of Ghent. Albert Gallatin also served as Minister to France and as Minister to England and was nominated for the Vice Presidency of the United States, but declined the nomination.

Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that Albert Gallatin's background is one to be respected and revered. It is for this reason that in August of 1977 I visited the Friendship Hill site in my congressional district at the request of many individuals and groups who were concerned about its future status.

During this visit I met with the current owner, who advised me that he was financially unable to maintain the property in a proper manner, and it was his desire to see the Federal Government purchase this property and thus preserve it for future generations.

It became apparent during my visit that the size of the property was the main factor in the owner's inability to maintain the structure and the surrounding environs.

The main house consists of 25 rooms, with a well house, a gazebo, a 5-unit servants quarters, and a dairy barn in close proximity. The estate consists of approximately 700 acres of picturesque land, 2½ miles from the Monongahela River.

I might add, Mr. Speaker, that this acreage and river frontage undoubtedly offer a great potential for the development of recreational facilities, and if properly done, will in no way detract from the historic dignity of the home.

As I toured the house it was very apparent that the house, although structurally sound, was in dire need of extensive repairs. The private gas well which supplies the house with heating fuel is inoperable, although usable. Thus, the home has been without heat for the past two severe winters. The house also requires extensive roof repairs, painting, replacement of rotting exterior woodwork, and elimination of excessive dampness in the basement area.

The National Park Service officials who accompanied me on our trip stated in their report that it was their opinion that serious structural damage might occur if the house is to remain in the ownership of its present owner.

As a result of the serious threat to the structure and its obvious historical importance, the Honorable Cecil D. Andrus, Secretary of the Interior, included Friendship Hill as one of the 13 sites that had the potential for inclusion in the National Park system. Secretary Andrus submitted this report to the Congress on November 30, 1977. This recommendation by the Secretary was based on the historical significance of the site, its potential to become a viable part of our national park system, and the imminent threat to it.

By stating these facts, Mr. Speaker, it is my desire to relate to my colleagues and all individuals and organizations, not only in the State of Pennsylvania but throughout our country, that they are of the opinion that Friendship Hill is indeed threatened and worthy of preservation.

By supporting H.R. 10984, we will not only preserve a vital part of our heritage which is not presently covered in our present system, but we will honor Albert Gallatin, a man who spent most of his life serving his country with the highest dignity as a Congressman and Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. SEBELIUS. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. SKUBITZ), the ranking minority member of the full committee.

Mr. SKUBITZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 10984, a bill to establish the Friendship Hill National Historic Site in the State of Pennsylvania.

This site will preserve the home and commemorate the life of a dedicated patriot, Albert Gallatin, who served this country well during its formative years.

Gallatin's distinguished career began as a Member of this body in 1795 and continued in 1801 as Secretary of the Treasury under Thomas Jefferson.

During the War of 1812, he was the primary U.S. negotiator for the Treaty of Ghent.

Later he was an able statesman as minister to France and Great Britain.

This legislation provides a lasting tribute to Albert Gallatin and his contribution to our country's early history. I therefore urge my colleagues to support its adoption.

Mr. Speaker, my colleague from Pennsylvania has related to the Members the positions which Mr. Gallatin held throughout the early days of our history, first as Secretary of the Treasury and later as a negotiator after the War of 1812. What he failed to point out was that it was Mr. Gallatin who really saved us from having a second revolution in the western part of Pennsylvania by the tremendous job he did in getting the forces together during the Whiskey Insurrection of 1793.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time, and I yield back the balance of my time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. PHILLIP BURTON) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill H.R. 10984, as amended.

The question was taken.

Mr. MOTTL. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 3, rule XXVII, and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this vote will be postponed.

PROVIDING RECOGNITION OF THE SERVICES OF GEN. THADDEUS KOSCIUSZKO

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and agree to the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 359) to provide recognition of the services of Gen. Thaddeus Kosciuszko.

The Clerk read as follows:

H. CON. RES. 359

Whereas the year of 1977 marks the bicentennial of the Battle of Saratoga, a turning point of the American War of Independence; and

Whereas a part of the victory at Saratoga is credited to the military genius of General Thaddeus Kosciuszko of Poland; and

Whereas the engineering skill and advice of General Thaddeus Kosciuszko contributed significantly to the tactics of the Continental Army in both the north and south theaters of the American War of Independence: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), that the sites of service of General Thaddeus Kosciuszko as identified by, but not limited to, the Polish National Alliance and the Copernicus Society, should be recognized by the Federal, State, and local governments as the "Kosciuszko Military Engineering Sites" and marked by suitable markers; and be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be encouraged to accept the donations of such suitable markers for placement within units of the National Park System, pursuant to the authority granted to the Secretary of the Interior in the Act of August 21, 1935 (49 Stat. 666).

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. SEBELIUS. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California (Mr. PHILLIP BURTON) will be recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. SEBELIUS) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California (Mr. PHILLIP BURTON).

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of House Concurrent Resolution 359, which was introduced by Representatives MINISH and ANNUNZIO, is to express the sense of Congress that the sites of services of Gen. Thaddeus Kosciuszko should be recognized and suitably marked, and to encourage the Secretary of the Interior to accept the donations of suitable markers for placement within units of the National Park System.

As to the background of this matter, Thaddeus Kosciuszko came to America in August 1776, and volunteered his services to help in the struggle for independence.

His background as an engineer and his military training were invaluable to the efforts of the patriots in many parts of the country.

Revolutionary War historians know of the great contributions of this Polish general in the battlefields of New York—and particularly at the Battle of Saratoga. He also contributed to the defense of West Point and played an important role in the defense of Philadelphia, as well as making a significant contribution as the chief engineer for Gen. Nathaniel Greene in the battlefield of the South.

The committee agrees that the contributions of this hero of the Revolutionary War have gone too long without recognition and that suitable markers at appropriate locations where he served would be a meaningful way to remember him.

Mr. SEBELIUS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I support this bill which recognizes the achievements and military contributions of Gen. Thaddeus Kosciuszko, and encourages the Secretary of the Interior to accent donations of suitable markers for placement within relevant units of the national park system.

I do want to stress, Mr. Speaker, that great care be taken by the National Park Service in approving the proper character, location, and appearance of such markers, so that there not be an overreaction to this legislation. I have seen some of the historic areas of our national park system that are so grossly overembellished with markers that it destroys the appearance and historic integrity of the scene.

Oftentimes the natural appearance of the spot of the historic occurrence can impart a more favorable impression of how it was if left alone, than if cluttered up with all kinds of contemporary markers and signs. Man's current works should be placed so as to complement the interpretation and contemplation of the early day historic scene, and not intrude unduly upon it. I hope the implementation of this legislation is done very sensitively and discreetly, so as to constitute an asset and not a detriment to the historic scene we are trying to protect and display.

Mr. Speaker, with those cautions, I do support this legislation.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the ranking minority member, the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. SKUBITZ).

Mr. SKUBITZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of House Concurrent Resolution 359 in recognition of Gen. Thaddeus Kosciuszko.

This resolution merely encourages the Secretary of the Interior to accept donations of historic markers recognizing the important role of General Kosciuszko in the Revolutionary War.

No appropriations are authorized by this resolution. All markers would be voluntarily contributed for placement in appropriate units of the National Park System.

General Kosciuszko's contributions to this country were truly extraordinary.

After first serving in the military of his native Poland, he joined the Continental Army in 1776.

His engineering talents were employed at virtually every critical confrontation with the British throughout the Revolutionary War.

His fortifications at Saratoga were decisive in that victory. Moreover, the world was shown that Americans could fight and win against England's finest troops.

In battle after battle—at West Point, at Philadelphia, at Yorktown—it was General Kosciuszko's engineering and tactical genius which provided the key edge to the Continental Army.

After the war, although he returned to Poland, General Kosciuszko donated his military compensation for the establishment of a school in New Jersey.

I, therefore, urge support for this measure recognizing a man who gave America so much and took so little, Gen. Thaddeus Kosciuszko.

● Mr. DERWINSKI. Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride as an American of Polish ancestry that I support the resolution before the House today to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to accept donations of markers recognizing the contributions of Gen. Thaddeus Kosciuszko to America's struggle for independence.

General Kosciuszko was appointed by the Continental Congress as an engineer in the service of the United States in 1776, and even prior to his commission, he had begun laying out plans for the defense of Philadelphia along the Delaware River. Next assigned to the Northern Army under the command of General Gates, Kosciuszko's selection of sites and design of defense fortifications were crucial factors in the first great American victory in the Revolutionary War—the Battle of Saratoga. Gen. George Washington commended him for his direction of the building of fortifications at West Point, which resulted in the British being thwarted from attacking the Hudson Highlands and the upper reaches of the Hudson River. Kosciuszko also served as chief engineer for the Southern Army, spending a total of 7 years in the service of our country during our war for independence.

There is no question of the importance of his military engineering achievements, and I believe that this resolution authorizing the donation of descriptive markers to be placed at Kosciuszko's military engineering sites deserve the full support of the House.

This resolution is not only consistent with the service rendered to our country by a great military leader during the Revolutionary War, but as noted, it is supported by Polish-American fraternal, civic, and political organizations. Their support dramatizes the rebirth of ethnic spirit that is a very positive factor in American cultural life.●

● Mr. MINISH. Mr. Speaker, Gen. Thaddeus Kosciuszko, the military engineering specialist who played such a vital role in the American Revolutionary victory, was once described by Thomas Jefferson as being "as pure a son of liberty as I have ever known."

We have before us, today, House Concurrent Resolution 359, which will express the American people's gratitude for Kosciuszko's contribution to the American cause.

General Kosciuszko cherished the tenets of freedom and independence with the same vigor as our Founding Fathers. For 6 years he labored without rest at the side of the Revolutionary forces, designing the fortifications which made possible some of the greatest American victories of the war.

Up and down the length and breadth of our newborn Nation, General Kosciuszko left his mark as a military genius. His contributions to the war effort are not disputed. When asked to locate and fortify a position where fleeing American troops could make a last stand against the British in New York, Kosciuszko selected and engineered a battlement at a site along the Hudson River at Saratoga. His astute planning resulted in a resounding victory for the American forces against General Burgoyne in a battle which is thought of by today's historians as being one of the 10 most important engagements in history.

Later, Mr. Speaker, General Kosciuszko labored for 2 years to establish impregnable defenses at West Point and further distinguised himself as chief engineer of the American Army of the South, resulting in the notable American fortifications at Charleston.

Mr. Speaker, House Concurrent Resolution 359, which is before us under suspension of the rules, will provide long-overdue recognition of General Kosciuszko's contributions to the American Revolutionary effort. Through this legislation, the locations of his greatest labors will be recognized as the Kosciuszko Military Engineering Sites. The erection of commemorative markers will be encouraged at these sites.

General Kosciuszko, himself, once commented:

> The title of "an American" will always be sacred to me.

Favorable consideration of this legislation, today, will insure that the name of Gen. Thaddeus Kosciuszko will remain sacred to future generations of Americans.●

● Mr. ANNUNZIO. Mr. Speaker, I rise to urge the support of my colleagues for House Concurrent Resolution 359, a bill I cosponsored with my good friend and colleague from New Jersey, Congressman JOE MINISH, authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to accept donations of markers recognizing the contributions of Gen. Thaddeus Kosciuszko to be placed at the sites of his service to our country. Kosciuszko was a valiant Polish patriot whose military engineering contributions were decisive in this country's struggle for independence in the Revolutionary War.

Also, I deeply appreciate the special attention given to this bill by Congressman PHIL BURTON, chairman of the Subcommittee on National Parks and Insular Affairs. I thank the chairman for his extra effort, and I know that Americans of Polish descent all over this Nation will also appreciate his outstanding cooperation on this legislative project.

House Concurrent Resolution 359 will not cost the taxpayers any money, since the historical markers called for in the bill will be provided by individuals and organizations interested in perpetuating the memory of General Kosciuszko's invaluable assistance to our Nation during its first years as an independent country. Because of the general's dedication and resourcefulness, Congress bestowed on him the rights and privileges of American citizenship and the rank of brigadier general.

General Kosciuszko's engineering genius is given credit for the American victory at the Battle of Saratoga in 1777, a battle which halted the British advance in the north and is described by historians as the turning point in the Revolutonary War. Kosciuszko also designed fortifications at West Point, N.Y., and in other parts of the country.

After the war, he returned to Poland in an unsuccessful effort to free his homeland of foreign occupation. However, he was exiled from Poland by the foreign conquerors, and returned to Philadelphia.

Thaddeus Kosciuszko's small brick home at 301 Pine Street in Philadelphia, now a national memorial, was visited by Cabinet members, Senators, and Congressmen, Governors, and foreign diplomats. However, his most distinguished and regular guest was then Vice President Thomas Jefferson, with whom Kosciuszko shared many hours. General Kosciuszko's heroism and dedication to the cause of freedom in America as well as his beloved Poland, and his compassion for the sovereign human right of self-determination makes clear the respect Jefferson felt when he said of his Polish friend:

He is as pure a son of liberty as I have ever known, and of that liberty which is to go to all and not the few and rich alone.

Mr. Speaker, Gen. Thaddeus Kosciuszko was devoted to democracy and human freedom and he put his life on the line in our country's fight for independence. House Concurrent Resolution 359 would recognize the various Kosciuszko military engineering sites with suitable interpretive markets in order that much-deserved recognition can be given by our country to the contributions of this great man and to enable the people of our great Nation to pass our precious heritage of hard-won freedom along to future generations. Again, I strongly urge the support of my colleagues for this bill.●

● Mr. LEDERER. Mr. Speaker, fellow Members of the House, I am pleased to bring to the attention of the House of Representatives the name of a great Polish patriot and hero of our own American Revolution, Gen. Tadeusz Kosciuszko.

Today, the House votes on House Concurrent Resolution 359 to commemorate the sites of service of General Kosciuszko. I am proud to note that one of the general's first services in the Colonies was as a military engineer for my home State of Pennsylvania. Moreover, the Kosciuszko House, where the general resided briefly to recover from wounds sustained in his service, is located in my congressional district and is restored to commemorate his service. With such closeness to his service, all Philadelphians share in honoring General Kosciuszko.

His life and service are worth noting here. In October 1776, following a short spell as military engineer for the State of Pennsylvania, Kosciuszko received a commission as colonel of engineers in the Continental Army. He served in the northern forces and advised in the planning of the defense of Ticonderoga, N.Y. Then in the spring of 1778 he went to West Point, N.Y., to take charge of the fortifications there.

Two years later, he left the northern command for service in the south, where he remained as a fighting officer and a strategist until the capture of Charleston in 1782. In recognition of of his many services, the following year the Continental Congress promoted Kosciuszko to brigadier general, made him a citizen of the United States, and awarded him a land grant.

After the war, Kosciuszko returned to Poland, but 5 years later, he took up arms again, this time as a major general of the Polish Army in defense of his native land against the Russians. Unsuccessful at first, Kosciuszko was forced to flee the country. In 1794, however, he returned to lead a victorious, if brief, uprising of the Poles. He was captured in the autumn and sent to St. Petersburg, where he was imprisoned. In 1796, he was released and exiled; he traveled to several European countries before returning to a hero's welcome in America in 1797.

A year later Kosciuszko went back to France, where he wrote his war memoirs, an important study of the horse artillery, and essays on various subjects, including the history of democratic thought. In addition, he was active as a propagandist on behalf of Polish freedom. Kosciuszko spent his last years in Switzerland, where he died on October 15, 1817, in Solothurn. He was buried in Cracow Cathedral. He is one of Poland's most honored patriots.

He is also one of America's most honored patriots. Philadelphians of all ethnic backgrounds join the House of Representatives today in honoring General Kosciuszko.●

The question was taken.

AMENDING THE NATIONAL TRAILS SYSTEM ACT OF 1968 (82 STAT. 919), AS AMENDED, DESIGNATING THE OREGON NATIONAL HISTORIC TRAIL AND TRAVELWAY AS A UNIT OF THE NATIONAL TRAILS SYSTEM

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 6900) to amend the National Trails System Act of 1968 (82 Stat. 919), as amended, to designated the Oregon National Historic Trail and Travelway as a unit of the National Trails System, as amended.

(1) In section 2(a) after "promote" insert "the preservation of,"; and after "outdoor areas" insert "and historic resources".

(2) In section 2(a) delete "(ii)" and the remainder of the sentence and insert "(ii) secondarily, within scenic areas and along historic travel routes of the Nation, which are often more remotely located.".

"(c) National historic trails, established as provided in section 5 of this Act, which will be extended trails which follow as closely as possible and practicable the original trails or routes of travel of national historical significance. Designation of such trails or routes shall be continuous, but the established or developed trail, and the acquisition thereof, need not be continuous onsite. National historic trails shall have as their purpose the identification and protection of the historic route and its historic remnants and artifacts for pubic use and enjoyment.".

(5) In the new section 3(d) delete "or national scenic" and insert ", national scenic or national historic".

(6) Change the title of section 5 to read "NATIONAL SCENIC AND NATIONAL HISTORIC TRAILS".

(7) In section 5(a), insert in the first sentence after the word "scenic" the words "and national historic" and change the second sentence to read: "There are hereby established the following National Scenic and National Historic Trails:".

(8) In section 5(a)(1), in the first sentence, after the word "Application", insert "National Scenic", and in section 5(a)(2), in the first sentence, after "Pacific Crest", insert "National Scenic".

(9) In section 5(a), delete paragraph (3) and insert in lieu the following new paragraph:

"(3) The Oregon National Historic Trail, a route of approximately two thousand miles extending from near Independence, Missouri, to the vicinity of Portland, Oregon, following a route as depicted on maps identified as 'Primary Route of the Oregon Trail 1841–1848', in the Department of the Interior's Oregon Trail study report dated April 1977, and which shall be on file and available for public inspection in the office of the Director of the National Park Service. The Trail shall be administered by the Secretary of the Interior.".

(10) In section 5(b) after "national scenic" wherever it appears insert "or national historic"; in the first sentence after the phrase "Secretary of the Interior", insert "through the agency most likely to administer such trail,"; delete the third sentence; and delete that portion of the fourth sentence which precludes the numerical listing, and insert in lieu the following: "The studies listed in subsection (c) of this section shall be completed and submitted to the Congress, with recommendations as to the suitability of trail designation, not later than three complete fiscal years from the date of enactment of their addition to this subsection, or from the date of enactment of this sentence, whichever is later. Such studies, when submitted, shall be printed as a House or Senate document, and shall include, but not be limited to:".

(11) In section 5(b)(3) after the semicolon add "and in the case of national historic trails the report shall include the recommendation of the Secretary of the Interior's National Park System Advisory Board as to the national historic significance based on the criteria developed under the Historic Sites Act of 1935 (49 Stat. 666; U.S.C. 461);"

(12) In section 5(b)(8) delete the word "and" at the end of the sentence; in section 5(b)(9) change the period at the end of the sentence; to a semicolon; and at the end of section 5(b) add the following new paragraphs:

"(11) to qualify for designation as a national historic trail, a trail must meet all three of the following criteria:

"(A) It must be a trail or route established by historic use and must be historically significant as a result of that use. The route need not currently exist as a discernable trail to qualify, but its location must be sufficiently known to permit evaluation of public recreation and historical interest potential. A designated trail should generally accurately follow the historic route, but may deviate somewhat on occasion of necessity to avoid difficult routing through subsequent development. or to provide some route variation offering a more pleasurable recreational experience. Such deviations shall be so noted on site. Trail segments no longer possible to travel by trail due to subsequent development as motorized transportation routes may be designated and marked onsite as segments which link to the historic trail.

"(B) It must be of national significance with respect to any of several broad facets of American history, such as trade and commerce, migration and settlement, or military campaigns. To qualify as nationally significant, historic use of the trail must have had a far-reaching effect on broad patterns of American culture. Trails significant in the history of native Americans may be included.

"(C) It must have significant potential for public recreational use or historical interest based on historic interpretation and appreciation. The potential for such use is generally greater along roadless segments developed as historic trails, and at historic sites associated with the trail. The presence of recreation potential not related to historic appreciation is not sufficient justification for designation under this category.".

(13) In section 5 delete subsection (d), and insert a new section 5(d) to read as follows:

"(d) The Secretary charged with the administration of each respective trail shall, within one year of the date of the addition of any national scenic or national historic trail to the System, and within sixty days of the enactment of this sentence for the Appalachian and Pacific Crest National Scenic Trails, establish an advisory council for each such trail, each of which councils shall expire ten years from the date of its establishment. The appropriate Secretary shall consult with such council from time to time with respect to matters relating to the trail, including the selection of rights-of-way, standards for the erection and maintenance of markers along the trail, and the administration of the trail. The members of each advisory council, which shall not exceed thirty-five in number, shall serve for a term of two years and without compensation as such, but the Secretary may pay, upon vouchers signed by the chairman of the council, the expenses reasonably incurred by the council and its members in carrying out their responsibilities under this section. Members of each council shall be appointed by the appropriate Secretary as follows:

"(i) a member appointed to represent each Federal department or independent agency administering lands through which the trail route passes, and each appointee shall be the person designated by the head of such department or agency;

"(ii) a member appointed to represent each State through which the train passes, and such appointments shall be made from recommendations of the Governors of such States;

"(iii) one or more members appointed to represent private organizations, including corporate and individual landowners and land users, which in the opinion of the Secretary, have an established and recognized interest in the trail, and such appointments shall be made from recommendations of the heads of such organizations: Provided, That the Appalachian Trail Conference shall be represented by a sufficient number of persons to represent the various sections of the country through which the Appalachian Trail passes; and

"(iv) the Secretary shall designate one member to be chairman and shall fill vacancies in the same manner as the original appointment.".

(14) In section 5 add a new subsection (e) as follows:

"(e) Within two complete fiscal years of the date of enactment of legislation designating a trail as part of the system, and within two complete fiscal years of the date of enactment of this subsection for the Pacific Crest and Appalachian Trails, the responsible Secretary shall, after full consultation with affected Federal land managing agencies, the Governors of the affected States, and the Appalachian Trail Conference in the case of the Appalachian Trail, submit to the Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs of the House of Representatives and the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources of the Senate, a comprehensive plan for the acquisition, management, development, and use of the trail, including but not limited to, the following items:

"(1) specific objectives and practices to be observed in the management of the trail, including the identification of all significant natural, historical, and cultural resources to be preserved (along with high potential historic sites and high potential route segments in the case of national historic trails), details of anticipated cooperative agreements to be consummated with other entities, and an identified carrying capacity of the trail and a plan for its implementation;

"(2) an acquisition or protection plan, by fiscal year, for all lands to be acquired by fee title or lesser interest, along with detailed explanation of anticipated necessary cooperative agreements for any lands not to be acquired; and

"(3) general and site-specific development plans, including anticipated costs.".

(15) In section 6 in the first sentence delete "or national scenic" and insert ", national scenic or national historic", and in the second sentence delete "or scenic" and insert ", national scenic, or national historic".

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. SEBELIUS. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California (Mr. PHILLIP BURTON) will be recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. SEBELIUS) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the National Trails System Act, approved October 2, 1968 (82 Stat. 919), as amended, established a mechanism for the development of a national system of trails. At that time two trail routes were designated as national scenic trails: The Appalachian Trail, traversing approximately 2,000 miles through the Eastern United States extending from Maine to Georgia, and the Pacific Crest Trail, traversing approximately 2,350 miles extending through three western States from Washington to California. Segments of these two popular hiking routes had been in existence through previous use, and gained formal recognition and increased Federal protection and support through this legislation.

This 1968 enabling act also identified a series of other prospective trail routes considered to be of possible merit for national trail designation, but for which insufficient information was available at that time upon which to make a final determination. Hence, identification of such prospective trails was made in the legislation—commonly referred to as the "study list"—on which the appropriate Secretary was directed to make further detailed study and submit to the Congress recommendations as to the suitability of the various study candidates for designation as national trails.

Many of the 14 study trails originally listed have been studied and recommendations have been transmitted to the Congress. One such trail receiving a positive recommendation for becoming a designated route is the Oregon National Historic Trail, which is proposed for addition as a unit of the National Trails System by this legislation.

In the process of review of the various routes identified on the study list, it became apparent that two quite distinctly different types of trails existed, each having materialized from different patterns of use and for different purposes, and each, likewise, continuing to be worthy of perpetuation for somewhat differing patterns and purposes of use. The two initially established national scenic trails had materialized through time principally for recreational benefit. They generally traversed major mountain ranges through a great variety of scenery and landscapes, and afforded physical refreshment and spiritual inspiration to the hiker. Their continued use into the future definitely necessitates the protection of a continuous and uninterrupted route of travel, as well as adequate buffering from the intrusions of man's adjacent, more civilized and developed world.

In contrast, a number of the routes identified for study involved routes of travel of our early pioneers—paths of explorers, of settlers, of the advance of commerce, and of military campaigns. It is important that these routes be appropriately commemorated, not only on maps and in the history books, but also on the very face of the American landscape itself, as opportunities to preserve these very real remnant imprints of our historical heritage may yet physically exist. Much, if not most, of these imprints no longer exist, however—having faded into oblivion through the influences of natural forces and time, or through the expansion and intensification of use of travel routes and attendant development by man over the very top of the original route itself. In either event, original historic fabric may not yet remain. Nevertheless, the marking of the entire route, on-site, can and should be considered, where feasible and appropriate, and some of the best of the remaining segments of the trail route—where historic remnants or imprints of integrity yet remain, or where some particularly historic event occurred—should be protected.

As can be easily recognized, travel over many of these historic routes had a much different purpose than did the more contemporary routes which have materialized for scenic and recreational purposes. Routes for these earlier travels often materialized as the shortest, easiest or fastest distance between two points, and bore no necessary contemplation of or correlation with routes of attraction of enjoyment. Such routes were often monotonous, hot, dusty—or all of the above—and foot travel over all or parts of these same routes today, even under greatly decreased duress, may still not be sufficiently attractive to warrant continuous preservation of the entire route across the countryside for purposes of trail travel.

Consequently, for trails accorded the historic category designation, it is contemplated that only certain identified segments of a particular trail route may be subject to actual onsite protection and development for use. The extent and location of these segments will be identified in the historic trail study report to be submitted to the Congress, and may possibly be further identified or expanded upon by the comprehensive management plan subsequently to be prepared for each individual trail. In developed areas, the route, to the extent it sufficiently exists or so warrants, might merely be commemorated by appropriate signs. It may never be possible—as a practical matter—to traverse an entire historic trail route without some detours, discontinuities or disruptions because of the contemporary works of man and the patterns of land ownership. Such are the realities associated with the preservation and use of historic trails.

The Oregon Trail was a wagon road stretching 2,000 miles from Missouri to Oregon's Willamette Valley, It was not a road in any modern sense, but only parallel ruts leading across endless prairie, sagebrush desert, and mountains to an unknown "Promised Land."

A quarter of a million people set out on this faint track, their possessions reduced to what could be carried in a wagon or on the backs of their livestock. Most said goodby forever to friends, relatives, and familiar places. Many were destined to a shallow grave along the way, and the Oregon Trail often has been called the longest cemetery in the Nation.

To survivors, the 6-month journey was the most important event in their lives. Over 700 of them left diaries and journals. These written accounts, together with remnants and relics of the trail itself, today provide a window to the past.

Many trail remnants have been erased by the bulldozer and the plow. Much of the route today lies under highways and city streets, or traverses farmland where prairie grasses and sagebrush have given way to corn and wheat. Here and there, however, are segments relatively untouched by civilization. Much of the Oregon Trail's potential for public enjoyment lies in these visible remnants, and in the historic sites associated with the trail.

What remains of the Oregon Trail lies gently on the land, as easily erased as a pencil line on paper. If protected, these remnants can provide future generations the opportunity to catch glimpses of our land as it appeared to the pioneers, to relive vicariously their great adventure, and to sense the enormity of its consequence.

Mr. SEBELIUS. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, I support this legislation which will establish the Oregon National Historic Trail, and will also establish a new category of national historic trail, through amendments to the National Trails System Act.

I certainly want to commend the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. JOHNSON) who is a most effective member of our committee, for his fine leadership on this bill. We would not have this bill here on the floor today had it not been for his determined effort and enthusiasm.

I think it will be very helpful in times ahead as we consider the addition of new trails, to have this additional category of historic trail. The provisions of the bill for this new category are much more responsive to the needs and requirements of historic types of trails, and our evolving national system of trails will be all the better for it.

The Oregon Trail is certainly well known for its important role in the westward expansion and development of our Nation, and it is well time we lend it the national recognition and protection it deserves, through the provisions of this legislation.

Mr. Speaker this bill has numerous provisions, and there are several I would like to comment on specifically.

Nearly a full decade has elapsed since the enactment of the original legislation which established our national trails system. There were 14 trails listed for study at that time, and all of these studies have still not been completed and submitted to the Congress in all this time. To correct this situation, this legislation provides a reporting deadline of 3 years after a trail is added to the study list, so we can avoid these forever lingering submissions.

The bill also significantly shifts Interior Department conduct of these studies from the Bureau of Outdoor Recreation to the National Park Service. It has shown to be an awkward situation in the past for one agency to conduct a study and make recommendations that another agency will have to live with.

Another feature of this bill is to require the development of comprehensive management plans for each national scenic or national historic trail. This is in keeping with the standard practice of having such a guiding document for all units of the national park system, for many wilderness areas, wild and scenic rivers, et cetera. This plan will be particularly helpful in the case of trails. which go through so many States and jurisdictions. In this way, the plans for acquisition, protection, development and use can be publicly stated for the benefit and knowledge of all interested entities, landowners and the public.

The legislation recognizes the necessity of identifying carrying capacities for all trails, and for developing plans for their implementation into management of the trails. This is designed to assure that these trails do not become overused, so that both the resource values and the social experience are adequately preserved.

I would like to also comment on one specific feature of this legislation—a provision which removes the prohibition in the existing law of condemnation authority over the Pacific Crest Trail. Approximately 351 miles—or 15 percent—of the route of the Pacific Crest Trail yet remains on privately owned lands. Most of this is in California. There is nothing to say that this land cannot remain in private ownership, but some secure and permanent arrangement must be made to assure that public access over the trail route is always available, and that the integrity of the resources of the corridor is not jeopardized. The condemnation authority is meant to be used only as a last resort device to assure that the trail corridor is adequately protected. I think that the U.S. Forest Service, which is the lead agency for coordinating and managing this trail, should give this matter priority attention through assessment of the situation, and the conclusion of whatever agreements or acquisition may be deemed necessary, and should also report the status of the situation and plans for further action to the appropriate committees of the Congress within 6 months of the enactment of this legislation. I would hope they would take it upon themselves to follow such a course.

Mr. Speaker, I believe this is a good piece of legislation, and I urge its approval by my colleagues.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SEBELIUS. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. JOHNSON).

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I am happy to yield to the distinguished gentleman from California (Mr. PHILLIP BURTON).

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. Speaker, I, too, would like to join with the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. SEBELIUS), the ranking minority member on our subcommittee, in my most emphatic commendation to the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. JOHNSON) for his diligence, his efforts, and his leadership in bringing this matter up to this point and hopefully to ultimate fruition. The gentleman is to be commended for his hard work on our committee and in particular on this legislation, and for the leadership that he has shown.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the distinguished gentleman from California (Mr. PHILLIP BURTON) for his willingness to expedite this particular piece of legislation.

I do not suppose that very many people in the eastern part of the United States appreciate the human hardships that were incurred by those people who left Missouri and walked across the United States, the western half of the United States, in order to get to Oregon or to California. But it is one of the most dramatic events in American history in my mind and has been so from the time that, as a boy, I read the book "The Oregon Trail," by Francis Parkman, that has addressed to the trip out along the Platte River, then down the front range of the Rockies and back along the Arkansas River. Through this book he became one of the greater American historians. This was one of the great moments in American life when these people took to this trail. About some 250,000 of them want along the trail. Many of them died on the way. This was due partly because they did not understand about the dangers of pollution and they polluted the rivers so that the people following along behind them were then drinking contaminated water and as I say many of them died. The South Platte River became known as the longest cemetery in the world. Children particularly died by the thousands as they attempted to make this long trek through these areas in the western half of the United States. It is indeed a memorable thing for me to go along the area of this trail where one can still see the wagon wheel ruts still in the sod along the trail. Also there are some places in Wyoming where when there is a high wind, you can see artifacts that have become uncovered, dolls, for instance, left by children, knives, forks, and spoons, things of that kind that were discarded or lost by the pioneers as they traveled the trail. Those things are still uncovered along the way. There are some 230 miles out of something like 2,000 that have potential trail segments for preservation. There are some 36 highly potential historic sites and hopefully the commission that is to be established under the legislation will take the necessary steps so as to acquire these and preserve them for future generations.

I would like to make one more remark about the historic aspects of the bill and that is that there are many historic trails in this country which, to my mind, ought to be preserved, or at least denoted or marked so that the travelers can recognize them. The Oregon Trail is just the first one that is going to be designated. There is also the California Trail that went along the southern route, the Santa Fe Trail is another, the Chisholm Trail, the Butterfield Trail, and others. There are also trails in the Midwest that people feel should be commemorated that show the efforts of the people in our country and which have particular significance in the minds of many. I believe they will have significant meaning to those of us who are interested in the preservation of the early reminders of the history of our country that will last through the centuries if properly maintained and cared for.

Mr. DON H. CLAUSEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. DON H. CLAUSEN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

Mr. CORCORAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CORCORAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I ask for this time in order to engage the sponsor of this legislation in a colloquy. First of all, I want to make clear that I enthusiastically support H.R. 6900. I think the provision which develops a new category for treating these trails as historic trails is something that is long overdue, and I would hope that the full membership would support the legislation.

I would like to point out that during the Easter break just concluded, I had the opportunity to tour the Illinois-Michigan Canal, which is in large measure a part of my district. In October of last year I introduced a bill which would designate the Illinois-Michigan Canal as a part of the National Scenic Trails System, H.R. 9570, and it is against that background that I would like to ask the sponsor of the bill a few questions.

First of all, will there be other trails added to this new historic trail designation?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. That would depend upon sponsoring legislation, but the legislation contemplates that there will be other trails that will be examined and designated.

Mr. CORCORAN of Illinois. With respect to future designations, does a trail have to go through the feasibility study for a scenic trail before it can be an historic trail?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. It has to go through the same study process.

Mr. CORCORAN of Illinois. In the gentleman's opinion, will the House Committee on Interior and Insular Affairs be considering a package of legislation which would include, as I noted in the gentleman's earlier comments, the recognition of several other potential historic trails?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I cannot speak for the chairman of the subcommittee, but I would suppose that if there were enough separate trails, that could be done, yes. At the present time I do not know that I could even comment on it at this point.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I will be glad to yield to the gentleman from California.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

We are in the process of preparing an omnibus bill that will, hopefully, deal with a great number of deserved areas about which there have been expressions of interest by our colleagues. I am not sure in all particulars what will be included or excluded from that omnibus bill, but once we get that out of the way, we can measure the parameters of that effort. We do not intend to stop working for the balance of the session, and we will then recycle, if you will, or review, if you will, the other pending proposals of the Members. It is my hope that within the limitations imposed upon us in terms of fiscal outlays that we will be able to treat a lot of these items that we have neglected in the past. I am reasonably optimistic we are going to be reasonably productive this year. Regarding the particular question, I have not yet had an opportunity to study the gentleman's bill and, therefore, am in no position to give him specific assurances in that respect.

I would note this, however, that we have made an effort on our committee to be as bipartisan as could be, because we believe regarding these natural resources that should be protected, our objective is best served when all of our colleagues proceed—and we are going to proceed—in a bipartisan way without the kind of partisan consideration that sometimes intervenes in some of the other subject matters which come before us.

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I would just add to what the gentleman from California has said that this has been a totally bipartisan type of approach. The gentleman's committee is noted for that, and he is to be congratulated. Those of us in the minority thank him for his broad-minded attitude and his tolerance toward our approaches, and his willingness to help us, because without him these things could not have been accomplished.

Mr. CORCORAN of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. JOHNSON of Colorado. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CORCORAN of Illinois. I thank the gentleman for yielding.

I have one more question of the chairman of the subcommittee. With respect to H.R. 6900, it seems clear to me that there is a precedent being established here regarding this new historic category. Would the gentleman agree that this is a new precedent?

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. If the gentleman would yield, I think it is a noteworthy addition of a category, the historic trails concept, and I suspect, more than any other single thing that has been done, if you will, having this as a part of the gentleman from Colorado's basic bill is further testimony that we are trying to see that proper credit, without regard to partisan considerations, is the essential thrust of our committee.

Mr. CORCORAN of Illinois. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. SEBELIUS. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the ranking member of the full committee, the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. SKUBITZ).

Mr. SKUBITZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 6900, a bill to establish the Oregon National Historic Trail.

There are two primary purposes for this bill.

First, the National Trails System Act of 1968 is amended to provide a new category consisting of national historic trails.

This designation recognizes the distinction between scenic trails—like the Appalachian Trail—which provides an uninterrupted route for recreational purpose—and routes of historic significance which may be interrupted by the progress of mankind.

Historic trails are to be designated in their entirety on appropriate maps and documents, marked onsite where practicable, and preserved in part when found to be of high potential historic value.

The second purpose of this bill is to designate the Oregon Trail as the first entry in the new national historic trail category.

This action is entirely fitting for a route which stands alone in the magnitude of its symbolic tribute to the pioneer spirit which helped make this Nation.

A quarter of a million people set out on this 2,000-mile path from Missouri to Oregon—many never completed the arduous trek. But for those who did, it was one of the most important experiences of their lives.

The symbolic traces of the bravery and determination of those early men and women who are the "roots" of our greatness, deserve to be preserved and commemorated.

I, therefore, urge support of this measure insuring that heritage—the Oregon Trail—will be available to future generations.

Mr. SEBELIUS. Mr. Speaker, I yield the balance of my time to the gentlewoman from Nebraska (Mrs. SMITH), in whose district this trail means more than any other Member of Congress.

Mrs. SMITH of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman.

Mr. Speaker, since I have lived most of my life within miles of the Oregon Trail, the landmarks, stories, and historic remnants of the vast westward migration are an intimate part of my own personal heritage. For this reason, I am a cosponsor and enthusiastic supporter of H.R. 6900. In fact, H.R. 6900 beautifully complements my dream to properly commemorate the most significant landmarks encountered by our west-bound forefathers by creating the Trails West National Historic Park in the States of Nebraska and Wyoming.

It generally took travelers about a month to reach the present State of Nebraska. By that time, all the freshness and novelty of the trip was far behind and only gruelling sacrifice lay ahead. When the 429 miles of Oregon Trail through Nebraska was traversed, the pioneers would be prepared for the Rockies. This toughening process, however, was costly in terms of wagons, livestock, and human lives. Sickness, accidents, and Indian attacks would be responsible for culling the weak and hardening the strong.

When the emigrants reached Ash Hollow, they were in for the first test of their ability to handle rough terrain. Here the prairie was broken by a deep canyon through which the trail descended in a series of steep and dangerous grades to the river bed below. Today a marker indicates where wheels were locked and ropes used to ease the conestogas down abrupt Windlass Hill. Ash Hollow—now a State historical park—would be the first element of the Trails West National Historical Park and is certainly critical to a full telling of the Oregon Trail story.

Let me at this point explain briefly the concept of H.R. 1732, the Trails West National Historic Park bill. This historic park would include the most important landmarks along the Oregon Trail that carried the pioneers west toward their "manifest destiny"—Ash Hollow State Historical Park, Courthouse and Jail Rocks, Chimney Rock National Historic Site, Scotts Bluff National Monument, and Fort Laramie National Historic Site. H.R. 1732 would link these individual entities together under the historic westward expansion theme, thus enhancing their cumulative significance. Management of this park, which is the heart of the Oregon Trail, would be facilitated by visitors centers already located at Fort Laramie, Scottsbluff, Ash Hollow, and Mud Springs Pony Express Station. I hasten to stress that Trails West Park would be very inexpensive because each of these sites is currently in the public domain. They would be donated to the National Park Service to assist their mission of reconstructing the Oregon Trail story. H.R. 6900 and H.R. 1732 have the same goal: honoring the pioneers and focusing national attention on the historic resources of their chosen route west.

After the voyagers left Ash Hollow and proceeded up the North Platte Valley, the next notable milestone of their trip was Courthouse and Jail Rock. According to one account, these twin cliffs were named by early travelers from St. Louis who thought it resembled their county buildings back home. A nearby cliff had the words "post office" etched on it, and travelers often deposited letters in boxes hewn in the soft stone hoping that an eastbound trapper would convey them back to civilization.

Chimney Rock was probably the most famous landmark on the trail. This jagged needle was within view to the 19th century voyagers for several days and was a natural wonder for the quarter of a million emigrants who paused at its base. This shaft of stone, called "wigwam" by the Indians, was the subject of more mentions in pioneer journals than any other point on the overland migration route.

Scotts Bluff National Monument was the first butte of dominating height to prophesy of the highlands ahead. Many undoubtedly climbed to the summit to view the great trail 800 feet below. This massive promontory, named for Hugh Scott, a fur trapper killed in the vicinity around 1828, was Me-a-pa-te to the Indians, or "hill-that-is-hard-to-go around." The Overland Mail, Pony Express, Pacific Telegraph, and Overland Stage all built stations near the cliff.

Fort Laramie was the most important stop on the westward trek. Miles of travel had damaged the wagons. With the mountains looming ahead, defective wagon parts had to be replaced and depleted stores replenished before setting off toward South Pass, the lowest and widest break in the continental divide. Besides its pivotal role in westward emigration, the fort was also a key military post. It secured the territory against Indian attacks.

In 1854, however, the fort's commander insisted upon the surrender of an Indian accused of stealing a traveler's cow. Lieutenant Grattan was sent to enforce the demand. The demand was refused and a dispute followed. In the ensuing engagement, Grattan's entire detachment was killed. This incident touched off Indian wars which would rage for another 35 years.

As I mentioned at the outset, the Oregon Trail heritage is very dear to me. Today's visitors should be allowed to retrace the 2,000-mile trail. H.R. 6900 has my full support and I urge my colleagues to support it as well.

H.R. 1732, the Trails West Park bill, has received hearings in the House National Parks Subcommittee. I also urge the Congress to complete the commemorative process it will begin today. Honoring a trail is somewhat incomplete unless we preserve and honor the landmarks and natural wonders that provided the most memorable experiences for the trail's first travelers. Wagon wheel ruts, although interesting, are only important because they carried the pioneers through Ash Hollow, past Chimney Rock and Scotts Bluff, into Fort Laramie, and finally west to the Pacific. H.R. 6900 will be a wonderful complement for the Trails West National Historic Park. Since the Trails West Park would cost little and contribute immeasurably to the story of westward expansion, I heartily urge Congress to complete the commemoration it is beginning today by honoring the Oregon Trail.

Mr. DON H. CLAUSEN. Mr. Speaker, I want to add my support to this bill now before us which establishes the Oregon National Historic Trail, and also sets up a new general category of national historic trail.

In looking at the 14 trails on the original study list of the 1968 Organic Act, the great majority of them are historic type trails, and when and if we get around to designating any of them, many of them will certainly need to be considered as candidates for this new historic trail category. For that reason, I am glad to see we are setting up this category now. Most of the studies on the original 14 study trails have been completed, and soon they will all have been submitted to the Congress. I think it would be a most responsible action for the Interior Committee to review and act on all of these together, so that we can develop a proper overview of these trails collectively as to what degree of historic preservation and recreation opportunity would be entailed nationwide.

These historic routes are the product of the migration of many thousands of earlier day Americans, and wherever sufficient remnants of these trails and their associated historic features yet exist, we should closely scrutinize the desirability of providing adequate preservation and protection.

Mr. Speaker, I sincerely commend the gentleman from Colorado (Mr. JOHNSON) for his fine leadership on this legislation, and I certainly want to lend my strong support to his effort.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion offered by the gentleman from California (Mr. PHILLIP BURTON) that the House suspend the rules and pass the bill, H.R. 6900, as amended.

The question was taken.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to clause 3 rule XXVII, and the Chair's prior announcement, further proceedings on this motion will be postponed.

PROVIDING FOR THE ESTABLISHMENT OF THE LOWELL NATIONAL HISTORICAL PARK IN THE COMMONWEALTH OF MASSACHUSETTS

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I have transmitted to the desk a few technical amendments which have been agreed to, but are not in the printed copy of the report. None of these amendments are opposed or controversial and, as a matter of fact, have been cleared and worked up by the minority as well as the majority.

Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 11662) to provide for the establishment of the Lowell National Historical Park in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and for other purposes, as amended.

The clerk read as follows:

H.R. 11662

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled,

FINDINGS AND PURPOSE

SECTION 1. (a) The Congress finds that—

(1) certain sites and structures in Lowell, Massachusetts, historically and culturally the most significant planned industrial city in the United States, symbolize in physical form the Industrial Revolution;

(2) the cultural heritage of many of the ethnic groups that immigrated to the United States during the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries is still preserved in Lowell's neighborhoods;

(3) a very large proportion of the buildings, other structures, and districts in Lowell date to the period of the Industrial Revolution and are important historical resources, including the five-and-six-tenths-mile power canal system, seven original mill complexes, and significant examples of early housing, commercial structures, transportation facilities, and buildings associated with labor and social institutions; and

(4) despite the expenditure of substantial amounts of money by the city of Lowell and the Commonwealth of Massachusetts for historical and cultural preservation and interpretation in Lowell, the early buildings and other structures in Lowell may be lost without the assistance of the Federal Government.

(b) It is the purpose of this Act to preserve and interpret historically and culturally significant sites, structures, and districts in Lowell, Massachusetts, for the benefit and inspiration of present and future generations by implementing to the extent practicable the recommendations in the report of the Lowell Historic Canal District Commission.

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 2. For purposes of this Act—

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is a second demanded?

Mr. SEBELIUS. Mr. Speaker, I demand a second.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, a second will be considered as ordered.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California (Mr. PHILLIP BURTON) will be recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. SEBELIUS) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentleman from California (Mr. PHILLIP BURTON).

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, the purpose of H.R. 11662 as reported by the Committee on the Interior and Insular Affairs is to establish the Lowell National Historical Park in Massachusetts to preserve the most significant example of a planned industrial city in the United States.

The preservation of the city, also established with the park, was done with the cooperation of a Commission consisting of Federal, State, and local members, to protect this historic park in connection with the National Park Service.

Lowell was founded in 1822 at a site on the Merrimack River about 30 miles north of Boston. The city's developers brought together for the first time some of the most advanced ideas of the day in the areas of power generation, industrial and transportation technology, production control, capital formation, scientific research, and social organization. Because Lowell was a new city, it could be planned for mass production, unencumbered by an existing urban fabric or an entrenched lifestyle. As a result, Lowell became this Nation's first great industrial city, and the way of life that evolved there contained the germ of our modern industrial society.

The industrial revolution created a new social order, lifestyle, and urban environment. The self-sufficient cottage craftsman was replaced by a working class which produced and consumed goods. Life for working people became regulated by time and a moral tone conducive to the discipline required for factory employment. New forms of industrial finance and management—like the corporation—were developed, and a class of capitalists replaced the landed aristocracy. The production process was facilitated by the development of the industrial city with its segregation of manufacturing, commercial, and residential activities.

The integration of separate ideas and forces to form a social and industrial system, the physical embodiment of that system in a new city, and the way the two evolved over time to influence people's lives are the heart of the Lowell story.

Lowell transformed the textile industry by perfecting the system of creating finished products from raw materials at one location. Before the development of the Lowell system only a small part of the production process was carried out within a given factory.

Ultimately, Lowell's story is the story of people, their working and living conditions, their origins, their motivations and desires, and their lifestyles as embodied in their homes and neighborhoods. Lowell was founded by tough yet visionary entrepreneurs who became the leading industrialists of their era. They were motivated not only by profit, but also by the utopian ideas of James Cabot Lowell, who believed that an industrial community could be both healthful and moral.

The majority of Lowell's early work force was made up of young, single women who came from all over New England. They were attracted to Lowell by the good wages, its religious tone, and its educational opportunities.

After 1850, immigrants of many nationalities began flooding into the city. Many were forced from their homes by economic disasters. Irish, British, French-Canadians, and later, Greeks, Poles, and Portuguese replaced Yankee mill girls as the chief source of labor.

By 1900, only 20 percent of the city's 100,000 inhabitants were native born of native parents. Different groups resided in segregated areas and developed distinct cultures that enabled them to adjust to urban, industrial life. These working class, ethnic neighborhoods still evolve and flourish in Lowell and their traditions are an important historical and cultural resource.

Lowell was one of the most remarkable examples of urbanization in the early 19th century. Within 20 years it grew from a rural area to a city of over 30,000.

A core area developed within the working and living areas of downtown Lowell. Within this cross section of 19th century Lowell can be found two mills, boarding houses, two power canals, important commercial and municipal buildings, social and educational institutions, and early transportation facilities.

Taken together the preceding elements describe an area of Lowell which can be termed Lowell's "historical and cultural scene." Within this area are the most significant resources which embody key aspects of the Lowell story. This area also provides a rationale for defining the extent of the proposed Lowell National Historical Park. While the park will intensively use only a modest portion of this "historical and cultural scene," programs will be established to preserve and enhance resources in the entire cross section.

Local preservation efforts began 12 years ago when a Model Cities community group produced a set of objectives aimed at revitalizing the city through the rediscovery of its heritage. This theme has since been adopted as the cornerstone for private, city and State development in Lowell and has resulted in a financial commitment of more than $50 million.

In October 1972, the Lowell City Council adopted a resolution designating the historical park concept as the focal point for local planning efforts. The city development authority took the lead with other local agencies in insuring that every major community improvement project was not only consistent with but supportive of the urban park concept. Since 1975, the city has spent more than $12 million for projects either integral to or supportive of the historical park.

The Commonwealth of Massachusetts has spent or pledged more than $10 million toward the development of the Lowell Heritage State Park, a project aimed at preserving and developing the recreational potential of Lowell's canal system and riverbanks.

In January 1977, the congressionally mandated Lowell Historic Canal District Commission unanimously recommended the creation of a Lowell National Park. The commission also proposed a detailed plan for the preservation and interpretation of Lowell's resources. A living national park, it was stated, would offer an extraordinary opportunity for Americans to explore the roots of their own culture while rediscovering a much neglected part of the Nation's history.

Industrial history has been largely overlooked by the Federal Government in its efforts to encourage preservation and to establish the national park system. In evaluating the effectiveness of the national park system in preserving and interpreting our heritage, the Park Service has concluded that "... there are serious gaps and inadequacies which must be remedied while opportunities still exist." These inadequacies are especially critical in the aspects of American history which Lowell represents. For example, Park Service studies have shown that the American experience related to commerce and industry, manufacturing, science and invention, urban design, and engineering is the most poorly represented of any thematic area in the national park system. Another weak area of the system relates to the development of American society and culture including the roles of ethnic minorities, occupational groups, economic classes as well as social and humanitarian movements such as utopianism, women's rights and labor organizations. These are all areas well represented in Lowell, where a preservation and interpretation effort can close many of these gaps in the national park system.

Despite substantial investment by the city of Lowell, Commonwealth of Massachusetts, and the private sector, many of Lowell's significant structures and properties are threatened. Therefore, the assistance of the Federal Government is essential. Only the National Park Service has the expertise and facilities to interpret Lowell's role in the industrial revolution for the benefit of present and future generations of Americans.

Mr. SEBELIUS. Mr. Speaker I yield myself such time as I may consume.

(Mr. SEBELIUS asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. SEBELIUS. Mr. Speaker this legislation constitutes a fairly bold new step for direct Federal involvement and financial support of large-scale historical rehabilitation and restoration efforts in a very urbanized downtown area of Lowell, Mass., and I congratulate the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS) for his leadership. I have visited this area twice on subcommittee inspections, and I am genuinely supportive of efforts to preserve the historic fabric of the old locks and canals and certain textile mill complexes which were such a dominant part of the early scene of the development of Lowell as one of America's first planned industrial cities.

The principal concern I have, however, is one of the degree of Federal involvement and the proper roles and responsibilities of the various governmental and related entities which are to be involved. There is the potential that the Federal Government could be expected to carry too much of the burden both financially and managementwise, particularly as the rehabilitation effort extends into areas of current operating commercial and business enterprise in the downtown area. This legislation cannot be permitted to be construed or utilized as a quasi or indirect effort for otherwise desirable urban renewal under the guise of a legitimate, nationally significant historic preservation effort.

I have had a concern with the original legislation in terms of the national historical park boundaries encompassing such a large area, most of which never will be nor should be publicly owned and available for public use in the more conventional sense of established units of our national park system. To my thinking, it is a serious misnomer to put the national historical park label on an area of this size which so predominantly embraces privately owned and operating commercial real estate. Through an adopted committee amendment, the size of the actual area to constitute the national historical park was considerably scaled down, with the result now being that the national historical park boundary will include only that area which constitutes the core of the important historic fabric of Lowell—the specified sites to be directly controlled by the National Park Service, the locks and canals and immediately related features, and the formerly identified "intensive use zone." This change makes the bill more acceptable to me.

The larger area, originally proposed to be the boundary of the national historical park, will still exist under a different name, and will constitute the boundary within which the newly authorized Commission may operate.

Even with this major change of boundary and several other refining amendments which were adopted, I still must express concern that Federal funds and National Park Service involvement be applied only to very legitimate, identified historic rehabilitation and restoration efforts which will return significant benefit to the American public. This legislation, in its implementation, must not be permitted to become a bottomless "goodie bag" of financial assistance for the nonpublic benefit of local interests in Lowell.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a part of my statement the following table, as extraneous matter, which reflects the current thinking of how the funds appropriated to the Commission are intended to be expended:

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, at this time I yield such time as he may consume to the author of this legislation, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS).

First, however, let me pay tribute to the gentleman from Massachusetts, whose enormous commitment and effort has produced this product, a product about which in its earlier drafts I had major reservations. If there is any single example of dogged determination, ultimately resulting in legislative consideration of an idea whose time has come, that illustration is before us today.

For all these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I warmly commend our distinguished colleague, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS), and am pleased to yield him such time as he may consume.

Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. Speaker, before getting to the major portion of my remarks, there are basically two or three comments I would like to make to add to what has been said previously.

The first concerns the question of what the role of the Park Service is in telling the people of this country what our history is all about and in making that story available.

Let me first review, Mr. Speaker, some of the accomplishments of the National Park Service.

Our natural wonders: Yellowstone, Yosemite, Grand Teton.

Our Civil War: Gettysburg, Antietam, Manassas.

Our American Revolution: Independence, Minuteman, Colonial Yorktown.

Our Presidents: The Jefferson Memorial, the Lincoln Memorial, the Roosevelt birthplace.

In America, we have memorialized our natural beauties, our wars, and our Presidents.

Our children can travel to see the canyons that awed America's pioneers. They can see the many battlefield graveyards of the Civil War. They can step into the room where the Declaration of Independence was signed. They can see the statues of Lincoln, the birthplace of Lincoln, his emancipation proclamation, and the site of his death.

Some of the children in Lowell, Mass., have seen these sites. Perhaps, on a weekend, their parents took them 15 miles south to see the rude bridge that arched the flood. Perhaps, one summer, their parents took them to Washington or maybe even as far as California to see Yosemite.

I grew up in Lowell. In school I learned about the purple mountains majesty. About truthfulness and cherry trees. And about many wars. I do not regret that education. What I do regret is that I never learned about Lowell.

All that time I did not know why canals ran throughout the city. I did not know why there was a mile of red brick mills along the Merrimack. I did not know why my father had come here from Greece, nor why every neighborhood seemed to have such different customs.

We did not know that Lowell was named for the financier and shipbuilder who had brought the power loom to America. We did not know that within 30 years Lowell had been transformed from farmland to the world's largest producer of cotton textiles by a single corporation. We did not know that Lowell, a model for hundreds of new cities, had changed the face of the Nation.

Charles Dickens had come to Lowell and praised the early working conditions. Presidents Jackson and Lincoln had come to Lowell to see the shape of America's future. So had thousands of visitors and planners.

Our parents and grandparents had come from all over Europe to build Lowell. To work 14 hours a day as card tenders and jack spinners. They also built neighborhoods like Little France and the Acre, churches like the first Greek Orthodox Church in the Nation, they had street stands and social clubs and foreign language newspapers. These people built not only Lowell, but the America we know today.

Yet, Lowell, like our Nation, had little interest in this history or in these cultures. In Lowell High School the industrial revolution was something that took place in England. The country had been willed by Washington, administered by the Adamses, framed by Franklin, and built by Daniel Boone.

I never learned that 30 feet from my classroom lay the first power canal the Nation had seen. Next door was the church the corporation had built for the Yankee mill girls. Across the street was the original city hall, the first savings bank, the first primary school, a boarding house, a mill agent's house, and a score of 19th century commercial buildings. And everywhere we looked—the mills.

This was the past left out of our history books. The past we were ashamed of. We were taught to praise famous men. Taught to worship a melting pot full of great American dreams. But as Jane Holtz Kay has written of Lowell—

Hide it, flee it, flatten it, deny it, our identity lies in this urban industrial past.

Twelve years ago Lowell decided that its identity was important. Important to its people and to the Nation. There are hundreds of people who should be credited for discovering this America. Many were the descendants of the immigrant workers who wanted the good and the bad of the past preserved, rather than flattened and denied. Today I can say that there are over 90,000 persons in Lowell who deserve credit for this renaissance. For the unity in Lowell is remarkable. It has resulted in the investment of over $50 million to restore and preserve the physical symbols of the Industrial Revolution.

Today, Lowell is offering to share its identity with the Nation. We can help many Americans rediscover a much neglected past. We do not come here looking for a handout. We come here looking for a partnership.

Today, by the consideration of H.R. 11662, the House of Representatives can choose to offer Lowell such a partnership. We are considering the recommendation by the National Park Service, that the city be the site of a unique national historical park.

This is not the first such compliment the House has paid to Lowell. In January of 1975, Congress noted Lowell's national significance to the Nation by creating a commission to determine how best to preserve and interpret this story. The result was a report which won three national awards. It is the basis for H.R. 11662. I would like to read the first words of this report:

Growth and change have long been dominant in the American system of values. Things which have outlived their usefulness are removed and replaced. As they go, so do our opportunities to learn from them. As a people we rush forward, urged by a vague and anxious need to keep moving.

Perhaps because the nation is 200 years old, perhaps out of exhaustion, the realization is growing that we have lost touch with what America means. What does it mean? How did we get here? Who are we? What values reside in our actions? What possibilities lie before us?

Lowell, Massachusetts, provides an extraordinary opportunity for Americans to find answers to these questions while exploring the roots of their culture and their way of life.

You need not depend upon a Congressman who grew up in Lowell to tell you that the H.R. 11662 can fill a serious gap in the national park system. In a study conducted by the National Park Service, it was concluded that "America at Work" is the theme—"the most poorly represented of any in the national park system." Another theme relating to Lowell, the theme of "Society and Social Conscience" is described as—"clearly one of the weak areas of the system's representation." In fact, of 13 subthemes represented in Lowell, 5 are partially or poorly represented and 8 are not represented at all.

Perhaps this is why, on February 17, William Whalen, Director of the National Park Service, testified in favor of a Lowell National Historical Park. Director Whalen stated, Lowell, due to its unique ability—more so than any other city—(can) portray the beginning of commerce and industry in America. Lowell presents an opportunity for preservation and adaptive use that should not be lost.

I would like to quote the testimony of one additional speaker. Historian Paul Rivard made these comments in 1974:

I am not presenting this statement to urge that development of the Lowell Park on the basis of architectural or engineering preservation, although this is certainly a worthy objective. I am not here to illustrate the potential uses of Lowell as a scholarly document, although it is perhaps America's finest document. Instead, I would suggest that the Lowell project be considered as testimony to the millions of workers, entrepreneurs, engineers, and businessmen who built American Industry through their work in this city and in the countless smaller 'Lowell's' throughout America. Countless Americans have worked as weavers, mechanics, or any multitude of other skills But what remains today of their work in the public consciousness? Where is the history of this segment of the American public?

Lack of attention to industrial history has led to a homogenized view of the industrial laborer. The results are skills which are demeaned in their worth, and workers whose pride is eroded by public disinterest and lack of historical perspective. It is therefore as a testimony to the worth—the value—of these many occupations that the Lowell project should be considered. What I wish to emphasize is simply this: not only will the Lowell National Park be an important tool for educators, historians, and casual visitors, but it will have even a more striking and personal meaning for Americans who work in similar occupations today—people whose story has thus far largely been cut out of our national history and consciousness.

So today I ask you to join 48 of your colleagues in the House, the Department of Interior, the House Interior Committee, the President's Advisory Council on Historic Preservation, Preservation Action, the Sierra Club, Friends of the Earth, the National Parks and Conservation Association, the AFL–CIO, the Massachusetts Legislature, the Lowell City Council, and many other organizations and individuals in supporting establishment of a Lowell National Historical Park.

It is my hope that generations of Americans will visit this living exhibit of the Industrial Revolution. That they will come to see its last working mill, ride a canal barge past the mill canyon walls, visit the 19th century boardinghouses and stores, walk alongside the spectacular Merrimack Falls, taste the ethnic foods, and observe the ways of work and life of the people who helped to build our country.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to recognize the contributions of various people who helped bring this bill before the House today. First, the gentleman from California (Mr. PHILLIP BURTON), chairman of the subcommittee, who has been guiding this bill from its inception; second, the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. SEBELIUS), together with his staff, whose amendments have clarified the title of the bill; third, the recognized contribution of Bradford Morse, who was a Member of Congress for 12 years, who first introduced the bill; and Congressman Paul Cronin, my predecessor.

I would like to recognize the contribution of the State of Massachusetts and Governor Dukakis, who has committed the State to $26 million to the State Heritage Park to complement what the Federal Government is being asked here today.

And, lastly, on behalf of the people of Lowell, who are committing their dollars, both in terms of private dollars and the city of Lowell, to do their share to pursue the historic dream to make sure that, for all time following, the story of the industrial revolution of the United States can be told.

Mr. SEBELIUS. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. SKUBITZ).

Mr. SKUBITZ. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of H.R. 11662. But I do have some reservations with regard to the bill. This bill, rightfully, recognizes the historic role that Lowell, Mass., played as a model planned industrial city at the beginning of the industrial revolution. But Lowell today is a much different place than the Lowell of 100 years ago. It is a highly urbanized area, suffering from many of the same problems which face cities all across this country. These problems concern me, and I believe we have appropriate programs and legislative vehicles to help solve these problems; but designating this area as a national historic park or preservation district is not one of them.

Under this bill the national historical park area is under the administration of the National Park Service, while the preservation district is administered by a joint local, State, and Federal commission. I think it is important to point out that neither the $18.5 million authorized for the park nor the $21.5 million for the preservation district should be seen as some kind of new funding for urban renewal.

I am concerned that some of the language of this bill might be construed as condoning such use of the money.

I point out to the chairman of the subcommittee that in the findings and purposes of the bill, it states that the Congress finds:

. . . certain sites and structures in Lowell, Massachusetts, historically and culturally the most significant planned industrial city in the United States, symbolize in physical form the Industrial Revolution;

It speaks of the structures, historic and cultural, but it does not speak of having national historic or cultural value.

On page 33, we find this language:

It is the purpose of this Act to preserve and interpret the historically and culturally significant sites, structures, and districts in Lowell, Massachusetts . . .

And then on page 49, we find, in section 302:

Within 1 year after the date on which the Commission conducts its first meeting, the Commission shall submit to the Secretary a draft park preservation plan—

Which is to include an index of property to be acquired within the park or preservation district.

And then if we turn to page 55, we find the guidelines for this index:

any property in the park or preservation district (except for any property designated in section 201(a)(2) of this Act) which should be preserved, restored, managed, developed, maintained, or acquired by the Commission because of its historical, cultural, or architectural significance;

Mr. Speaker, I ask the chairman this question: When we speak of acquiring or restoring property which has historic, cultural or architectural significance, is the test—Does it have national historical, cultural, or architectural significance?

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. If the gentleman would yield, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman is correct.

Mr. SKUBITZ. If that is correct, I have no objection to the bill. I just do not want the money to be used to restore any project in the area.

Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SKUBITZ. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. TSONGAS. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman can be assured that before anything can be done to the structure, there must be an index of buildings, as submitted by the Commission to the Secretary.

Mr. SKUBITZ. The only reason I bring the point up is that we speak all the way of historical and cultural significance, but do not use the words "national historical and cultural significance." I want the record to show that that is what we intend by passage of this bill.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SKUBITZ. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to my colleague, the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. SKUBITZ). I think he is making a good statement on why we should not vote for this bill.

Do I understand that the gentleman is against the bill?

Mr. SKUBITZ. I am not against the bill, but I want the structures that are to be rehabilitated to have national historical significance so that we will not see some building downtown put in that category.

Mr. ASHBROOK. If the gentleman will yield further, Mr. Speaker, this sounds a little bit like an urban renewal project to me.

Mr. SKUBITZ. That is exactly what I am trying to guard against by saying that the only buildings that will be recommended are those that have national historic significance.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, once again I would like to commend our distinguished colleague, the ranking minority member of the full committee, the gentleman from Kansas (Mr. SKUBITZ), for his insight and for his successful effort to make clear that this is not an urban renewal project under another guise.

Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Ohio (Mr. SEIBERLING).

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I would like to add my commendation to the chairman of the Subcommittee on National Parks (Mr. PHILLIP BURTON) and also the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. TSONGAS) for their successful resolution of the unique problems involved in putting together this kind of historic park in an urban area. I think it is a remarkable job and one that is not only significant from the standpoint of creating a new national historical park, but one that the whole country can look upon as a model for local as well as State action in other similar situations. None will, of course, be precisely similar, but still, this is a model of historic preservation and interaction between State, Federal, and local agencies.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the gentleman one specific question: The waterways or the canals that powered the industry in 19th century Lowell are among the most scenic as well as historic features of this area. How is the Federal role going to assure that these will be properly protected to the extent that they are not in the Federal land portions of the bill?

Mr. TSONGAS. If the gentleman will yield, Mr. Speaker, it is contemplated that the Commonwealth of Massachusetts will negotiate with the owners of the canals to insure that outcome and to minimize the Federal expenditures, while still maintaining the historic character of the area.

Mr. SEIBERLING. Mr. Speaker, I want to commend the gentleman for an outstanding job.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I have no further requests for time.

GENERAL LEAVE

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that all Members may have 5 legislative days in which to revise and extend their remarks on the bill presently under consideration.

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the immediate consideration of a similar Senate concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 44) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to accept donations of suitable markers recognizing the contributions of Gen. Thaddeus Kosciuszko.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate concurrent resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from California?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate concurrent resolution, as follows:

S. CON. RES. 44

Whereas the year of 1977 marks the bicentennial of the Battle of Saratoga, a turning point of the American War of Independence; and

Whereas a part of the victory at Saratoga is credited to the military genius of General Thaddeus Kosciuszko of Poland; and

Whereas the engineering skill and advice of General Thaddeus Kosciuszko contributed significantly to the tactics of the Continental Army in both the north and south theaters of the American War of Independence: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That the sites of service of General Thaddeus Kosciuszko as identified by but not limited to the Polish National Alliance and the Copernicus Society should be recognized by the Federal, State, and local governments as the Kosciuszko Military Engineering Sites and marked by suitable markers; and be it further

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be encouraged to accept the donations of such suitable markers for placement within units of the National Park System, pursuant to the authority granted to the Secretary of the Interior in the Act of August 21, 1935 (49 Stat. 666).

Mr. PHILLIP BURTON. Mr. Speaker, this Senate concurrent resolution which is offered in lieu of the House concurrent resolution is virtually identical. The main effect of this action is that we will now have completed action in both Houses on the Kosciuszko proposal.

The Senate concurrent resolution was concurred in.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 359) was laid on the table.

THE COMING OIL SHORTAGE IN MONTANA

(Mr. BAUCUS asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. BAUCUS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to address myself today to the problem of energy in Montana, with further specific reference to energy supply from our northern neighbor, Canada.

Montana is an energy exporting State. It produces hydroelectric power, coal, gas, and oil. Yet Montana has an energy crisis, like almost every other State. Those energy export figures cannot allow people in my State to be complacent.

Why?

First of all, our largest energy export is of coal. Montana lacks sufficient facilities for coal conversion to warrant its entire use within the State. The day will surely come when Montana will use more of its coal, but it will take time and needs sophisticated conversion techniques such as magnetohydrodynamics. Pollution control devices must also be perfected. So meanwhile, coal is a major export from the State.

Second, we export limited quantities of gas and hydroelectricity. However, these are relatively small quantities and much of our production is consumed locally.

Third is oil, and that is the subject I would like to focus upon.

Montana exports oil. We produce, refine and export it, sending it to eastern Washington, northern Idaho, and North Dakota. We consume large quantities ourselves; for example, out of 192.9 trillion Btu's of oil produced by Montana, fully 85.4 trillion Btu's were consumed by the transportation segment alone, which relies on petroleum products for 97.3 percent of its energy needs. Our agricultural sector relies on petroleum for 98.5 percent of its needs. So we have a marketing area and a domestic demand of considerable proportion, particularly when it is realized that those two sectors alone account for 13.2 percent of Montana's employment.

Nonetheless, we have a problem. It stems from the fact that years back, in the days before anyone dreamed of an energy crisis, Montana refineries were built to fit the nearest and best source of supply, which happened to be Canada. It was much easier to build a refinery to handle crude brought in from Canada than it was to use only our own. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, that in those heady days Canada was ardently selling its oil to us. We obliged and built our refineries to handle Canadian crude, so much so that Montana refineries used 40 percent Canadian oil in 1975.

The energy crisis changed all that. In October 1974 Canada's National Energy Board reported that Canadian oil supplies were being drastically depleted, and that production was declining at an alarming rate. Based on these findings, the NEB recommended that exports of oil be reduced gradually and be terminated by the early 1980's. The phaseout was gradual in part to allow U.S. refiners to find alternate sources of supply. Canada made clear that while it was willing to cooperate, it had to take care of its own needs first, and that we would have to do likewise. Canada's position was fully understood by our Government, which was sympathetic to the problem.

As a result, our Government has taken many measures to find alternate supplies. Obviously, Alaskan oil will eventually play a role in the resolution of the oil supply problem. Alternate sources of energy such as solar or wind power are being developed. Conservation measures are being encouraged. A national energy program has been presented and hopefully will be finally approved. We need it very badly. We must set our house in order if we are to survive.

Northern tier refineries were the hardest hit by Canadian cutbacks. Nonetheless, we went to work on the problem. We expanded shipments up through our midcontinental pipeline system. We worked out our problems on an Alaska pipeline, and oil is now coming down from the north slope of that State. We are looping lines which service the northern tier. We are using barges up our river systems. We are even studying unit trains as a means of delivery.

These efforts have helped. The eastern northern tier States are now beginning to get more oil via the intercontinental system. The Western States are getting Alaska oil.

But Montana and its marketing area remains a problem. We are too far west to obtain midwest pipeline service, and too far east to get west coast oil. And Canada is ending its shipment of sweet crude to Montana refiners by 1980.

We have plans for the longer run. We are actively considering the construction of a northern tier pipeline as one solution to bring crude to our refiners. But all this will take time, and the refiners anticipate a "window" period of 3 to 5 years when Montana will be in a critical situation.

What does this mean for Montana? The Department of Energy issued some interesting statistics: Canadian cutbacks could mean a loss of real income to Montana in 1978 of at least $225.4 million, with estimates running as high as $303.4 million. In the Billings area lone, DOE estimates that unemployment could reach as high as 2,755 workers. Meanwhile, Montana will be faced with a real problem: Where will it get all the oil it needs to keep its cars going, its agriculture functioning, its industries operating, and its homes heated?

There have been several proposals made. One has been temporarily successful: swapping arrangements with Canada. Under these agreements, U.S. and Western Hemisphere crude is delivered to eastern Canada via our midwestern pipeline in return for a continuation of western Canadian crude delivered to the northern tier.

It sounds like a good arrangement. Unfortunately, as we increasingly are taking care of our own needs, our midcontinent pipeline is now operating at capacity, with no room for crude to be shipped to Canada. As a result, we have no supplies to swap.

We have suggested that Canada permit us to deliver the oil to eastern Canada via Portland, Me. to Montreal. For a variety of reasons, including recent Canadian completion of a pipeline from Sarnia to Montreal which the Canadian Government thinks it must keep full, this has proven to be unacceptable to Canada.

A further possibility lies in U.S. storage of strategic oil in eastern Canada in return for continued swaps out west. There is evidence that Canada might approve such an arrangement. But again, we must study the feasibility of such a system of storage and that will take at least 2 years. And then it might prove unfeasible; I understand that at least one of the mines which have been suggested for such storage is under the sea and right now is full of water.

Time swaps have been suggested. We buy Canadian oil now in return for Alaskan oil delivered to Canada some time in the future. It sounds good, but no one knows what the price of oil will be a few years hence. Therefore no one wants to make such long term commitments.

The result is that we still do not have a solution to Montana's oil supply problem, or at least we do not have one which is economically viable.

I am concerned enough about the problem that I am traveling to Ottawa very soon to meet with Canadian energy officials. If we can somehow prevail upon Canada to make an exception for Montana, we will be assured stability until we have built our own line of supply. If Canada will not help out, we shall obviously survive, but at substantial cost. I am sure Montanans will adapt but we shall have a few tough years.

Looking ahead to that eventuality, it is important that Montanans study the options available. To this end, I also hope to organize a meeting in Montana of interested individuals, representing the various sectors involved, to see what can be done. If worse comes to worse, we may have to seek some Federal relief or other measures to ease the burden which geography has so unfortunately cast upon us. Whatever it is, something will have to be done, and I hope that meeting will at least start the process and focus attention on the problem we face.

RHODES LEADERSHIP APPLAUDED

(Mr. DEVINE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. DEVINE. Mr. Speaker, I note with pleasure an editorial in the Sunday, March 26, Arizona Republic praising the efforts of our minority leader, JOHN RHODES. Specifically, the editorial praises RHODES' work on the unanimous Republican vote against the ill-conceived Federal election bill.

For the benefit of my colleagues I would like to insert the text of the editorial at this point in the RECORD:

[From the Arizona Republic, Mar. 26, 1978.]

A VICTORY FOR RHODES

In at least one respect, the leader of a political party is like the leader of a wolf pack. Some follower will always be snapping at his heels. That's probably the way Arizona Congress John Rhodes feels today.

The Wall Street Journal reports that "conservative Republicans" hope to replace Rhodes as minority leader of the U.S. House of Representatives. Their candidate, according to The Journal, is Rep. Vander Jagt of Michigan. However, the news item ended with the prediction that Rhodes would survive easily.

The story followed by a few days a Washington Post report that Rhodes was in trouble with House Republicans because he tried to make a deal with the Democrats on campaign finance legislation.

The Washington Post is hardly the place to look for unbiased reporting about any Republican. It didn't oppose the legislation, which would have drastically reduced the amount of money a political party can give to a candidate in the congressional election.

Rhodes did oppose the legislation, and when the showdown came he secured a "No" vote from every one of his 139 fellow Republicans. He also picked up 69 "No" votes from Democrats. That was enough to beat the measure, which undoubtedly would have helped incumbent members of Congress and therefore assured the Democrats of retaining their 2-to-1 majority in the House and in the Senate.

It was a virtuoso performance. Rhodes told Ben Cole, of The Republic's Washington bureau, that he expected 70 Democrats would defect from their party on this vote. He missed the count by one vote. Cole called it "a David and Goliath victory for the Arizonan."

To predict the removed of Rhodes as party leader after such a smashing victory sounds like wishful thinking. Or maybe The Washington Post wants its readers to believe the Republican Party is being taken over by the radical right.

The Republican Party has a war chest of $16 million for this fall's campaign. It was raised in small contributions from 2 million citizens. The Democratic Party has very little in reserve. In fact, it is close to bankruptcy, and would much rather have "public funding" of all national election campaigns. That means using tax money.

Rep. Bob Stump of Arizona, a Democrat who voted with the Republicans on the campaign financing bill, said:

"This is the genius of the American Political process. Private contributions from individual citizens, business and labor organizations, political parties and other groups can be obtained by any qualified person.

"This encouraged good candidates to run, and most often discourages bad or ineffective candidates from jumping into the race. Since when did running for public office become a right that anyone is entitled to at the taxpayers' expense?"

That's a question Stump's fellow Democrats prefer not to answer.

Rhodes and 139 other Republicans have answered it conclusively.●

SOVIET REFUSENIK'S VIEW OF THE JACKSON-VANIK AMENDMENT

(Mrs. SCHROEDER asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend her remarks.)

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, while I was in Moscow, Prof. Naum Meiman gave me the following letter and statement to deliver to Senator HENRY JACKSON. I have done that, but I want to share his thoughts with my other colleagues also. His views were given to me in the apartment of Vladimir Slepak. Many other refuseniks were present, including the mother of Anatoly Shcharansky. They all agreed with Professor Meiman's view:

NABEREZHNAYA GORKOGO 4/22,
Moscow 113127, U.S.S.R., March 23, 1978.

Senator HENRY JACKSON,
The Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SENATOR: Some days ago I was interviewed by David Willis of the Christian Science Monitor about your Amendment. Some refusniks, dissidents and I consider the subject of primary importance, so I feel you should have my opinion in writing. You may use it any way you deem necessary.

I would like to add that Academician Sakharov has read this statement and expressed full agreement with it. He has no objetcion to mention of this fact.

Sincerely, yours,

Prof. NAUM MEIMAN.

THE JACKSON-VANIK AMENDMENT

The Jackson-Vanik Amendment is a constant target of attack by the Soviet mass media. It aggravates American-Soviet relations and has not achieved its immediate goal of facilitating emigration from the USSR, particularly for Jews. This rouses doubt in a certain section of the American public as to the advisability of preserving the Amendment. Notice should be taken of the systematic campaign against the Amendment by a narrow, but active group of businessmen, such as the management of Pepsicola. who are specially interested in Soviet trade. The clash of views and opinions compels me to present my stand on this question.

I believe the Jackson-Vanik Amendment is of far greater importance than transient politics. Perhaps it will be properly assessed with the passing of time. The Amendment is more than an important Act of Congress. It is something altogether new, something unprecedented. For the first time in history the top legislature of a great country deemed it necessary to pass a law supporting one of the basic human rights, that of freedom of movement, on a global scale. This right was throughout history the main criterion, the main test, distinguishing the free man from the slave and the serf.

The Jackson-Vanik Amendment created an entirely new situation, making it impossible once and for all to consider freedom of emigration as a domestic affair of the country from which one wishes to emigrate.

This is understood perfectly by the Soviet government, which has to take it into actual account in spite of all the thunder in the Soviet press. The Soviet government quite soberly sees the Amendment as a political reality.

Over a long range the Jackson-Vanik Amendment is one of the most effective ways to assist the emigration movement. I am convinced that it will still play an extremely substantial role in promoting freedom of emigration.

The Amendment has gained special significance since the Belgrade Conference, where the USSR in fact refused to carry out its human rights commitments under the Helsinki Agreements. The Belgrade Conference highlighted the need for permanent practical measures to make the USSR respect human rights.

Let me underscore that the Jackson-Vanik Amendment is important not only for Jewish emigration, even not only for any kind of emigration. It is a stimulus in the general efforts for human rights.

Let me close by noting that the Amendment has already produced telling, though not always apparent results. There are grounds to maintain that it has restrained the Soviet authorities from committing further, stronger reprisals against participants in the emigration movement.

Prof. NAUM MEIMAN.

REGARDING RELIGIOUS DISCRIMINATION BY IRS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Idaho (Mr. HANSEN) is recognized for 20 minutes.

Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, I rise to address the House on a serious matter regarding religious discrimination by the Internal Revenue Services.

The first amendment to the Constitution of the United States declares that—

Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition the government for a redress of grievances.

Unfortunately as the high ideals of the Bill of Rights come under increasing assault from the mushrooming bureaucracy of paternalistic government, our freedoms are disappearing one by one and article I is no exception.

Everywhere we see the minions of government clashing with the forces of individual liberty and tradition as so-called new standards and new practices of morality are imposed. This is manifested in arbitrary government decisions, not always successful, to interfere in private educational systems even if they accept no Federal funds; to force integrated housing between the sexes contrary to the moral codes of those involved; to end father-son functions and boys' State and girls' State programs because of sexual segregation; and a whole host of other controversial proposals, regulations and laws.

All of this constitutes an invasion of first amendment—and other—rights to varying degrees, but far worse abuses of individual rights are taking place which by nature are more difficult to identify because of the shroud of fear and intimidation which shield them from exposure.

Certain abuses of citizen rights exposed in recent years regarding practices of the Central Intelligence Agency and Federal Bureau of Investigation shocked the Nation and the overreaction by some people nearly ruined the effectiveness of both organizations.

However, several years of research and observation now convince me that the greatest assault on civil rights in this country is yet to be exposed. The CIA and FBI malpractices did not touch everyone because of their limited jurisdiction but one superagency, the Internal Revenue Service, does.

The IRS has the potential to reach everyone and the means to do it with the ruthlessness of a dictator because they are not restrained constitutionally as other agencies are.

Will the IRS misuse this vast authority? Is there evidence of abuse? Government agencies develop great competence in making themselves look good and covering their mistakes. In most cases a citizen is at impossible disadvantage in any showdown because of his limited resources and because the agency controls the ball game from the playing field to the referees.

It is not uncommon for documentation to be suppressed, destroyed or altered. It is not uncommon for the Government employee or average citizen to feel the threat of retaliation or the fear of intimidation.

On December 15, 1977, I wrote to IRS Commissioner Jerome Kurtz regarding grave concerns I had identified in IRS operation. Among these were problems involving religious discrimination against IRS employees and taxpayers. I asked, "Why is the IRS making such a strong effort to purge Mormon agents from key eastern Idaho audit positions particularly in the Idaho Falls area?"

Mr. Kurtz responded in a letter on February 24, 1978:

> Any such effort would be a violation of Federal law, established IRS policies and my personal convictions. Our investigation to date does not provide any basis for your allegations.

Chalk one up for bureaucratic platitudes and coverup. Does Government have the right to lie? I do not know who victimized Mr. Kurtz but the letter written for the Commissioner's signature was in absolute contradiction to volumes of facts available in IRS' own personnel and inspection files—unless, of course, they were destroyed as I have been told.

Fortunately for the truth, and perhaps unfortunately for any coverup by IRS, the records do exist and discriminatory practices are evident and provable. This is important because: First, current IRS employees are reluctant to talk because whistleblowers, no matter how right they are, always seem to suffer serious personal consequences, second, former IRS employees are reluctant to talk because of possible retaliation against them as taxpayers and especially because most of them remain in the accounting profession where they could be seriously handicapped by an adverse IRS relationship; and third, taxpayers in general are reluctant to talk because a hostile IRS can get at them year after year through their tax returns, even to the point of arbitrary harassing, embarrasing and expensive audits and investigations.

These records show that religious discrimination does indeed exist and, in fact, is broadly practiced by IRS. The particular sect subject to discriminatory practices may vary according to which one predominates, but prejudiced policies are domumented. Generally nothing beneficial can result from discrimination, but there are instances where employee manipulation for religious purposes has benefited some while doing harm to others which will be evident in the facts to follow.

A number of employee cases where religious discrimination is evident are available where IRS should not have to be advised because the records of substantiation come from their own files. In my own State of Idaho, IRS is involved in obvious Mormon manipulation.

One case within recent months had the Inspection Service extensively checking on an IRS employee to see if the individual was "doing too much Church work." For weeks IRS vehicles shadowed the employee only to conclude such an allegation could not be proved. However, no respectable person would want to work under such conditions and especially knowing that time is on the side of management and if they want to get you, they will finally get it done by destroying you little by little with adverse evaluations. Naturally the employee found a good job and got out. The personal situation has been salvaged but what can be said even on the outside without jeopardizing a professional career?

The most classic case involving a number of people throughout the Idaho IRS district office is one that is so widespread and covers so many years that IRS cannot possibly defend a position contending that they have no knowledge of discriminatory practices.

This involves the promotion-transfer from Idaho Falls to Boise of Mr. Dee Brady who according to witnesses including then District Director Howard Martin surprisingly was moved ahead of senior grade revenue agents. Mr. Brady was identified as a member of the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-Day Saints (LDS or Mormon) and his promotion opened a GS–12 Revenue Agent position in Idaho Falls, an area of high Mormon concentration.

Applications for the open position were made by four employees of which three were of the Mormon faith. Of the three highest qualified two were Mormons. George Blank, a non-Mormon, was selected and in the aftermath it became evident that religion may have played a part in the process.

Complaints were filed and an investigation launched by the Equal Employment Opportunity (EEO) office for the western region of IRS. Investigator Glen L. Johnson submitted his report on September 10, 1975.

On October 10, 1975 agreements were drawn up and subsequently signed by district director, Howard Martin; Kenneth Peterson, assistant counsel of the National Treasury Employees Union (NTEU); Stephen R. Nestor, union representative; Tedd Woodard, regional EEO officer; and complainants Paul DesFosses and Robert Weaver guaranteeing the next available promotions in Twin Falls, Idaho Falls, or Pocatello to Weaver and DesFosses, and that such action must be in a reasonable time. Some effort by IRS to circumvent apparently was made but the action was eventually forced as resolution of the complaints.

The NTEU bulletin for December 31, 1975, headlined an article, "NTEU Secures Promotions for Two Denied Jobs Due to Religious Discrimination." The article states:

> Completing his study, the EEO Investigator concluded that the employees would have been promoted if not for management's discriminatory attitude toward Mormons.

Statements by fellow employees told the story even though some made denials or claimed uncertainty of memory.

Revenue Agent Winford Spiva in the EEO interview is quoted as reporting group manager Gus Santilli's statement to him that—

> I know one thing for darn sure, I'm not going to put another Mormon in Idaho Falls.

On another occasion Spiva reports:

> Gus Santilli again stated that he was "darn sure that he was not going to put another Mormon in Idaho Falls."

This probability of religious consideration in IRS policy was reinforced by office auditor Robert Gillette who recalled Santilli conversations in his presence. Further corroboration of religious consideration in employee assignment was provided by employee Albert J. Seefried.

Revenue agent Connie Bee told the EEO Investigator:

> . . . Dean Bigler, the former group manager over Pocatello and Idaho Falls offices, mentioned to me that he was concerned about having three LDS revenue agents in the Idaho Falls post of duty due to the number of Mormons in the Idaho Falls area.

Bigler's statement to EEO investigator Darryl W. Roosendaal conceded that—

> During an indoctrination with her (Connie Bee), it is very possible that I stated a concern about the all-Latter-Day Saints office in Idaho Falls . . . It is my belief from various comments and impressions that the all-LDS office was of concern to our then Chief of Audit Division, Tony Koberstein.

In a letter to me dated August 6, 1976, Equal Employment Opportunity officer Barbara R. Thompson stated the following:

> Your correspondence dated June 21, 1976 concerning the request from Stephen Nestor with reference to Paul J. DesFosses and Robert Weaver was referred to this office.
> Paul DesFosses and Robert Weaver each presently have a formal complaint of discrimination pending in the administrative process. After the investigation of the allegation of discrimination on the basis of religion, the Regional EEO Officer attempted informal adjustment in accord with the Civil Service Commission regulations. An agreement was documented and signed by management and by the complainants. A report of investigation, the signed adjustment agreement and other related documents were forwarded to this office.
> After review, it was determined that the adjustment agreement exceeded the authority of the Service in that it was not incompliance with Civil Service Commission regulations. The Regional EEO Officer was requested to correct the deficiency. Mr. Weaver and Mr. DesFosses did not accept the adjustment agreement as corrected by the District Director . . .

Subsequent to the issuance of the letters of proposed disposition . . . a hearing was requested. The hearing was scheduled for July before a Civil Service Commission Complaints Examiner. The Director of Equal Opportunity Program, the Department of Treasury, will make a decision based upon the findings and recommendations of the examiner. If that decision is not accepted, it may be appealed to the Appeals Review Board, Civil Service Commission.

At this point, the primary issue appears to be the nature of the resolution that is acceptable to the complainants. The Service has made maximum utilization of the authority understood to be available but will implement whatever is the decision of the Treasury Department.

Following the letter from EEO, NTEU assistant counsel, Kenneth B. Peterson, from San Francisco, entered the case again in behalf of DesFosses and Weaver in strong letters to Dean Wright, chief appeals officer for the U.S. Civil Service Commission (Federal, Employee Appeals Authority) dated August 9, 1976, and to David A. Sawyer, Director, Equal Opportunity Program (Office of the Secretary of the Treasury) on September 1, 1976. Partial context of the latter is as follows:

Either you have not received a copy of the settlement agreement in question, or you have misread that settlement agreement, or you have had a failure of memory concerning the proposed disposition which was made. In fact, the settlement agreement which was reached on August 17, 1976, differs significantly from the proposed disposition made by the EEO officer.

The prior proposed disposition would have involved a competition between Mr. Weaver and Mr. Paul J. DesFosses for a single position. The loser in that competition would then receive no further remedy to redress the discrimination he had suffered. Furthermore, there was no time limitation on implementation of the remedy proposed.

In contrast, the agreement reached on August 17, 1976, concerns only the complaint of Robert D. Weaver, and does not discuss the still pending complaint of Mr. Paul J. DesFosses. The terms of the agreement provide that Mr. Weaver will receive exclusive priority consideration for the next available GS–12 Internal Revenue Agent position in Twin Falls or Pocatello, Idaho, and that such consideration shall take place within 30 days from the date of the agreement.

It is obvious that the terms of the negotiated agreement differ significantly from the proposed disposition made by the EEO officer, and that furthermore the terms of the agreement are significantly more beneficial to the complainant. I would suggest that you promptly correct any statistical records you may be maintaining concerning the acceptance of proposed dispositions by complainants, to indicate that the proposed disposition made by the Treasury Department in this case was not accepted.

The final results speak for themselves. Both Weaver and DesFosses received their promotions. That should be the happy end of a long struggle for justice against discrimination, but that is not necessarily so. IRS has not repented and only granted grudging relief when caught redhanded.

Mr. Speaker, discrimination goes on, harassment continues and, in the case of those who continue to stand their ground, retaliation becomes the name of the game. This and other forms of religious discrimination involving the handling of taxpayer matters are subjects for subsequent development.

LEGISLATION TO PERMIT ALL TAXPAYERS TO TAKE A DEDUCTION FOR CHARITABLE CONTRIBUTIONS

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from New York (Mr. CONABLE) is recognized for 10 minutes.

● Mr. CONABLE. Mr. Speaker, in February I joined with my colleague, JOSEPH L. FISHER, in introducing H.R. 11183, a bill to permit all taxpayers to deduct gifts to charity on their individual income tax returns. This is an area which requires our attention. We are reintroducing this measure with approximately 40 cosponsors.

In the interest of tax simplification and reform, we have unwittingly been reducing the tax incentives to charitable giving over the years until we have reached the point where soon only the very wealthy will receive any tax benefit from charitable giving. It is an easy step from that condition to the assumption that deductions for charitable contributions are only loopholes and that we would be better off letting the Government do the work of charities so that everyone can participate again in the good work of the world through his involuntarily donated tax payment. However, I for one do not want the Government running the Boy Scouts, or the churches, or all the universities, any more than I want only wealthy people to support them. As we see at every turn, Government control accompanies Government financing.

Let us look at some of the pertinent facts: Five increases in the standard deduction in the last 8 years have increased the number of taxpayers using the standard deduction from slightly more than 50 percent in 1970 to 75 percent in 1977. Charitable organizations estimate that they received about $5 billion less during that period as a result of this change. In 1977 alone, the loss was approximately $1.4 billion—$615 million of that amount is attributable to the standard deduction changes enacted by the Tax Reduction and Simplification Act of 1977 (Public Law 95–30). President Carter has proposed to extend further the use of the standard deduction by reducing the number of deductions which can be claimed; if this is realized, it is estimated that the number of taxpayers claiming the standard deduction would be increased to approximately 84 percent. In other words, if Congress adopts the President's proposals, only about 16 percent of the taxpayers would still be itemizing their deductions and thus be able to reduce their taxes by listing their charitable contributions.

The pluralism which the private charities provide is a great strength in our our society, and we should all be concerned about protecting and enhancing that diversity and strength. Certainly the major share of charitable giving is done for altruistic purposes, but the additional tax incentives are extremely helpful and appropriate, as well.

The expanded use of the standard deduction would be devastating for the voluntary sector. Contributions to public charities are certain to decrease, making it more difficult to meet the increasing demand for social services. The time has come to make a change that will offset the depressing impact of our recent tax decisions on the charities. Public policy should encourage and support the work of charitable organizations, not diminish it.

In my opinion, the only way to reverse this recent trend is to amend the Internal Revenue Code to permit all taxpayers to take a deduction for their charitable gifts, whether they itemize their deductions or not. It is estimated that revenue losses to the Treasury would be $2.35 billion. However, for each dollar of taxes lost by virtue of the deduction, estimates are that charitable organizations would receive between $1.15 and $1.30.

Furthermore, these increased gifts to charities would have a multiplier effect—they would bring an additional amount in volunteer efforts. Recent studies indicate a strong correlation between giving and active participation in charitable endeavors. For each dollar donated to public charities, there is an equivalent dollar's worth of volunteer effort. Conversely, if charitable giving continues to decline, there will not only be a loss in the financial base of the voluntary organizations, but there will also be a significant loss in volunteer effort.

I do not believe that the enactment of this legislation would be a step backward in our efforts toward tax simplification. It would require only a simple computation on the front of the tax form, much like the personal exemption. There is ample precedent for this treatment. Child care expenses, political expenses, and alimony now receive "above the line" treatment without protest from taxpayers utilizing those provisions.

The Ways and Means Committee is currently engaged in an extensive series of hearings on the President's tax reduction and reform proposals and related legislation. On Tuesday, April 4, the committee plans to devote the entire day to hearing representatives of charitable organizations testify on the President's proposals as they relate to charitable contributions. I hope that the members of the committee, as well as the rest of my colleagues in Congress, will recognize the uniqueness of the charitable contribution deduction and support the legislation to make it available to all American taxpayers.●

As previously announced, scheduled witnesses for this hearing include Secretary of Labor Ray Marshall and former Attorney General Ramsey Clark.

Those wishing to testify or submit a statement for the record should address their requests to the House Committee on the Judiciary, Subcommittee on Crime, 207E Cannon House Office Building, Washington, D.C. 20515.●

EFFECTS OF INTERNATIONAL BANKING ACT OF 1978 ON INTERNATIONAL BANKS IN THE UNITED STATES

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Florida (Mr. PEPPER) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. PEPPER. Mr. Speaker, on Thursday of this week H.R. 10899, the International Banking Act of 1978, is scheduled for floor action, subject to a rule being granted. I would like to call attention to a particular section of this legislation which affects each and every State. Section 5 of this bill, as reported from committee, would prohibit interstate branching of foreign banks unless State banks of the State where the foreign bank already is established also are permitted to branch into the State.

This conditional arrangement effectively precludes a State from choosing the alternatives for international banking activities which would be most fortuitous for that State, and would force international banks to conduct operations only in a major money center of the United States. There is little doubt that New York, Chicago, Ill., and the State of California would retain their predominance in the international banking field, with little opportunity for other States to enhance their own position in the financing of foreign trade.

Mr. Speaker, Florida is very troubled by this legislation for the reasons I just outlined, and I have been in continuous contact with our State comptroller on this subject. Florida has recently enacted legislation, effective on January 1 of this year, which permits international banking agencies and offices to operate in the State. At a glance, the International Banking Act would seem to meet Florida's situation because the bill does permit agencies to operate without a tie-in arrangement. We in Florida strenuously object to this view, however, because section 5 would close future options to permit international banking branches into our State should we decide to do so.

In the 3 months that Florida's international banking law has been effective, five banks have applied and been approved for operation; four have subsequently opened agencies in the Miami area, with the fifth, Lloyd's of London, about to do the same. I am sure Congress can appreciate the importance of Miami and all of South Florida as a center for Caribbean and Latin American trade. The future is bright and bold for international trade and finance in our State, and a foreclosure of future international banking options as contained in section 5 of H.R. 10899 is neither necessary nor desirable.

Because of the direct effect this legislation would have on all States' banking prerogatives, I believe the House will be interested in the following letters from State banking commissioners around the country. These letters support a deletion of the tie-in requirements of section 5 of the bill, and you may be aware that a motion to that effect will be made by Mr. ANNUNZIO when the bill is considered on the floor. It is interesting to note, moreover, that New York's superintendent of banks, a State which might be expected to benefit from section 5, indicated to the Banking Committee that such restriction would not accord New York any significant benefit, while they would represent a "substantial disservice to other States." Mr. Speaker, the letters from various States follow.

DEPARTMENT OF BANKING AND FINANCE,
Atlanta, Ga., March 15, 1978.

Re International Bank of 1978 (H.R. 10899).

Hon. LARRY MCDONALD,
Congressman, House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN MCDONALD: The subject Bill was reported out of the Banking Committee on February 23, 1978 and is now scheduled to go before the Rules Committee of the House with possible floor action as early as March 17th. The Bill reported out of the Committee has three areas which are of concern to this Department and to Governor Busbee. Those areas are Sections 5 and 7 of the Bill and the grandfather date contained in the Bill. The attached memorandum from the Conference of State Bank Supervisors outlines these problem areas.

With respect to Section 5, Representative Frank Annunzio (D., Ill.) will be offering an amendment which the Department and Governor Busbee consider desirable. We would urge your support of that amendment on the floor.

In the event Representative Annunzio's amendment is not successful, we would urge your support of an appropriate amendment to change the grandfather date in Section 5 from May 1, 1976 to May 1, 1978, or some other appropriate, but more current, date. Six International banks are presently operating in Atlanta and they all would be required to terminate their operations under the present grandfather date in the Bill. However, if Representative Annunzio's amendment is accepted concern over the grandfather date would become a moot point.

With respect to Section 7, the Department feels that language contained in the Bill when it came out of Subcommittee is more desirable than the language presently contained in the Bill. The Subcommittee language would have given the Federal Reserve System reserve setting authority over Federally-chartered International banking operations only; whereas, the language presently contained in Section 7 would give the Federal Reserve System reserve setting authority over State-chartered International operations also. If an effort is made to restore the Subcommittee language, we would urge your support of that effort.

If that effort is unsuccessful, we would urge your support of the language presently contained in the Bill, but would further urge your opposition to any effort to further strengthen the Federal Reserve supervisory role over State-chartered International banking operations.

Thank you for your consideration of this legislation which can have a significant impact on the future growth of International banking and International trade development in this country. If I, or my staff, can be of any assistance to you or if the Conference of State Bank Supervisors can be of any assistance to you, please feel free to contact me.

Yours very truly,

E. D. DUNN,
Commissioner.

STATE BANK DEPARTMENT,
Little Rock, Ark., March 17, 1978.

Re H.R. 7325—International Banking Act 1977.

Hon. JIM GUY TUCKER,
Member of Congress, House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN TUCKER: Arkansas, at this time, prohibits international chartering of banks in its state. If the above bill becomes law, more or less all of the international banking in this country will be confined to the states of New York and California. I do not think this is right. If Arkansas should, in the future, desire to have foreign banks or branches, then I think the state should enjoy the privilege if it so desires.

I am not supporting international banking in our state, but I do think it should not be confined to New York and California.

My good friend Jack Dunn, Commissioner of Banking in the State of Georgia, states that his state permits limited branching of foreign banks and if I understand the bill correctly, this would limit his state to accepting in the future foreign branch banks.

Very truly yours,

H. C. ADAMS,
State Bank Commissioner.

DEPARTMENT OF BANKING AND SECURITIES,

Re International Bank Act of 1978, H.R. 10899.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: It is my understanding that the above bill may be called before the floor of the House of Representatives for debate in the very near future.

As a state banking official I urge you to oppose Section 5 of the bill as it is now written. Representative Frank Annunzio will offer an amendment to the present Section 5 which I would ask you to support. Mr. Annunzio's amendment would preserve the authority which all states have had in the past to invite into their respective areas foreign-bank branches regardless of whether the particular branch of a foreign-owned bank might also be operating in another state. Mr. Annuzio's amendment would delete from Section 5 an onerous tie-in arrangement requiring that if a state desired to have in its borders a state-chartered foreign-bank branch located out-of-state, then state-chartered domestic banks located in the "home" state in which the foreign bank branch is operating must also be permitted the same interstate privileges. This tie-in arrangement has the effect of giving New York a virtual monopoly on international banking, particularly with regard to foreign-bank branches. The reason is simply that most all foreign-bank branches have a location in New York. Should Kentucky at some time in the future want to invite a foreign-bank branch into our state for international banking matters, our state should not be forced to also take a domestic bank from New York State.

Efforts may also be made on the floor of the House to broaden Section 7 to give the Federal Reserve Board additional powers over state-chartered foreign banking institutions and to treat them as though they were

"member" banks. This additional authority for the fed is not warranted. I would ask you to resist any effort to enlarge the powers of the fed to a degree greater than now provided in the bill.

Sincerely,

JAMES L. MCNEELY,
Deputy Commissioner.

Topeka, Kans., March 17, 1978.

Re: International Banking Act of 1978 (H.R. 10899)

Hon. LARRY WINN, JR.,
House of Representatives,
Rayburn House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR LARRY: I understand the above bill will soon be debated on the floor of the House of Representatives.

I urge you to support the amendment to Section 5 of this bill that Representative Frank Annunzio from Illinois will offer on the floor of the House. The reasons for asking this are set forth in the enclosed Memorandum prepared by the Conference of State Bank Supervisors.

In addition, please oppose any effort that might be made on the floor of the House to broaden Section 7 of the bill to give the Federal Reserve additional powers over State-chartered foreign banking institutions. It is anticipated that efforts will be made to offer Section 7 to give the said (1) the power to examine State-chartered foreign banking institutions and (2) to impose other provisions of Federal law as though they were member banks. These additional powers are unwarranted.

Governor Bennett and I discussed this particular bill a few months ago and we both agreed that in the event a foreign bank should locate in Kansas, we would prefer that supervision, reserves, and other regulatory matters be the province of our State Banking Department, rather than subject to the Federal Reserve Board.

With best regards,

EMERY E. FAGER,
State Bank Commissioner.

COMMISSIONER OF BANKS

Re International Banking Act of 1978 (H.R. 10899).

Hon. MORGAN F. MURPHY,
Member of Congress,
Rayburn House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MORGAN: I discussed with your office last Thursday my extreme concern about H.R. 10899, the International Banking Act of 1978, which will soon be considered by the Rules Committee.

The bill has severe implications for Illinois. Section 5, as reported out of the House Banking Committee February 23, would require that before Illinois could invite a state-chartered foreign bank branch operating in another state into Chicago, Illinois would have to permit domestic state-chartered banks from the same jurisdiction to also come into Illinois. Illinois law does not permit this so growth of Chicago as a competitive international money center would be stymied if H.R. 10899 were to become law as now written.

We need foreign branches in Illinois to support Midwest industries engaged in international commerce and to increase Illinois' role in international banking matters. Our domestic banking needs are being adequately filled by our own domestic banks. We certainly don't need interstate branching from New York, for example, for that purpose. No other state is anxious to have out-of-state domestic banks branching into its area. The net effect of H.R. 10899 would be to require foreign branches to choose a one-state limitation. Under this condition, foreign branches would undoubtedly locate in New York or California to the exclusion of other states that now, or in the future, desire such financial development.

I urge you to consult with Congressman Frank Annunzio and Congressman Henry Hyde who will communicate the severely negative impact that H.R. 10899 imposes on Illinois. If the bill were to become law, as presently written, it's conceivable that retaliation procedures by foreign countries could be applied against Illinois banks that are presently engaged in foreign banking activities in such countries.

The amendments adopted by the full Banking Committee on February 23 are so sweeping in their effect, as compared to the bill when reported from the subcommittee, that considerable time is needed for the states to evaluate the differences. Truly, several weeks are needed to give everyone an adequate opportunity to understand the full implications of the proposal in its amended form before it goes to the House.

Please contact me if you have any questions. Thank you.

Sincerely,

WILLIAM C. HARRIS,
Commissioner.

DEPARTMENT OF BANK SUPERVISION,
Jackson, Miss., March 14, 1978.

Re: International Banking Act of 1978 (H.R. 10899).

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: Attached is a copy of a memorandum from the Conference of State Bank Supervisors briefly summarizing Sections 5 and 7 of the above bill as they were amended in the House Banking Committee on February 23, 1978. CSBS opposes the sections as now written for reasons cited in the attached memorandum.

It is our understanding that Representative Frank Annunzio (D. Ill.) will offer an amendment to the present Section 5. The Annunzio amendment would simply preserve the authority which states have had up to this time to invite into their respective areas foreign bank branches, regardless of whether a particular branch of a foreign-owned bank is also operating in another state. His amendment would knock out the tie-in arrangement presently in Section 5 requiring that if a state wants to invite into its borders a state-chartered foreign branch that is already operating in another state, then state-chartered domestic banks located in the "home" state in which the foreign banking branch is operating must be permitted the same interstate privileges.

With respect to Section 7, the attached memorandum speaks for itself. However, efforts can be anticipated on the floor to reinstate provisions which would give the Fed (a) examination powers over state-chartered foreign branches, agencies and commercial lending companies, and (b) the right to impose any other provision of Federal law which could be imposed on member banks. If these latter two points were added, it would amount to the Fed having compulsory membership powers over state-commercial lending companies, and (b) the commercial agencies. There is no reason for such authority being vested in the Fed with respect to such institutions. The Fed does not have such authority with respect to state-chartered domestic banking institutions that have not chosen to be members of the Fed System, and to give the Fed such powers would be discriminatory relative to the state-chartered foreign banking institutions.

This department supports the views of CSBS as reflected in the attached memorandum and we would appreciate your consideration of this matter.

Cordially,

JAMES H. MEANS,
State Comptroller.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE,
Boise, Idaho, March 17, 1978.

Hon. STEVE SYMMS,
U.S. Representative,
Longworth House Office Bldg.,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR STEVE: We understand that the International Banking Act of 1978 (H.R. 10899) will be sent to the House Floor for debate on Tuesday, March 21, 1978. We appreciate the assistance you have given us so far on this piece of legislation and now we must call upon you again. We would like to point out briefly some important points concerning this bill.

At the present time the individual states determine whether foreign banking institutions can or cannot operate within their respective borders. Foreign banking institutions are located principally in New York and California, our nation's leading money centers, and to a lesser extent in Chicago, Illinois. There are a few foreign banks in Florida, Georgia, Massachusetts, Oregon and Washington, but about 98% of the banking assets are in New York, California and Chicago, Illinois.

The House Banking Committee on February 23 amended Section 5 of this bill (by a 25–18 vote) to provide that no state-chartered branch could operate outside its home state unless the laws of the state which it desired to enter would also permit interstate branching of domestic state-chartered nonmember banks located in the "home" state of the foreign branch.

The net effect of this provision is to legislate the dominance of New York in the international banking field. Why is this? Simply because nearly every foreign branch in the United States has a presence in New York State. Therefore, under this bill, if a state such as Florida, Georgia, etc., wanted to invite into their respective areas a foreign branch already operating in New York, it would have to also permit state-chartered nonmember domestic banks from New York to also come into their states. There is no desire, generally, on the part of states to permit out-of-state domestic banks into their areas, and this would be particularly true of having to permit large domestic banks from New York.

As a result, if this section were to become law, it would have the effect of forcing foreign bank branches to choose a one-state location, and under such circumstances they would choose New York to the exclusion of all other states, except possibly California. This would be detrimental to the efforts of any other state which might in the future desire to attract these foreign branches.

The claim is made by opponents of the present situation that the multi-state presence of foreign branches gives them an unfair competitive advantage over our domestic banks. What are the facts: The multi-state locations of foreign branches are almost entirely confined to New York and Chicago, Illinois. New York has 59 foreign branches and Chicago has 29 foreign branches, most of which branches are also in New York. There are only a handful of foreign branches in other states such as Massachusetts, Oregon and Washington. So we are not talking about large numbers of multi-state foreign branches, or many states into which they have gone.

What about our domestic banks and their interstate banking activities? A series of articles which appeared in 1975–1976 issues of the "American Banker," a financial newspaper, show that 13 large banks alone have some 1,483 so-called "nonbank" offices in some 43 states outside the state in which they are headquartered. These include Edge Act Corporations, organizations handling international banking matters for domestic banks; loan production offices which solicit loans throughout the country and do everything but actually finalize such loans and subsidiary banks which have been grandfathered under the Bank Holding Company Act. We have already been notified as recently as March 10, 1978 that Citicorp is planning to arrange a conversion of the Nationwide Finance Company offices in Idaho to Citicorp Person-to-Person Financial Center, Inc., offices. Although these domestic, interstate activities may not constitute deposit-taking functions in a purely technical sense, they generate deposits for their bank affiliates. Of these 13 banks, 12 through their out-of-state subsidiaries engage in interstate consumer and sales finance and in mortgage banking activities; 10 are in leasing activities; 9 in selling and reinsuring credit-related insurance; 8 are in factoring; 6 are in investment management advisory services and in real estate advisory services; 5 are providing venture capital to small businesses and handling computer services; 2 provide trust services and market travelers checks.

There is far more interstate domestic banking through these 13 banks alone than is engaged in through the interstate activities of a relatively small number of foreign bank branches which have their multi-state presence principally in New York and the Loop area of Chicago. The so-called competitive advantage enjoyed by foreign branches over domestic banks which cannot branch interstate is merely illusory.

Section 7 as amended by the House Banking Committee on February 23 would give the Fed reserve-setting over state-chartered foreign branches, agencies and commercial lending companies with worldwide assets of $1 billion. While this provision is much more palatable to us than the provisions sought by Representative St Germain in Committee, we take the position that these provisions are (1) discriminatory, in that affiliation with the Fed is optional for state-chartered domestic banks regardless of size and that it should be optional for foreign banking institutions, regardless of size; (2) the Fed has made no showing that it needs reserve-setting authority over all state-chartered domestic banks, let alone foreign-owned banking institutions.

We would like to inform you that Representative Frank Annunzio will offer an amendment to the present Section 5 and we would sincerely appreciate your support of the Annunzio amendment. This amendment would simply preserve the authority which states have had up to this time to invite into their respective areas foreign bank branches, regardless of whether a particular branch of a foreign-owned bank is also operating in another state. The Annunzio amendment would knock out the tie-in arrangement presently in Section 5 requiring that if a state wants to invite into its borders a state-chartered foreign branch that is already operating in another state, the state-chartered domestic banks located in the "home" state in which the foreign banking branch is operating, must be permitted the same interstate privileges.

On behalf of all the banks in Idaho, state and national, we sincerely appreciate your interest in this matter. If you should need additional information, please do not hesitate to contact me directly, or Mr. Alex Neale, Vice President/Director of Federal Legislation, at the Conference of State Bank Supervisors in Washington, D.C. Mr. Neale can provide you with additional information quickly by a simple telephone call; his address and telephone number is listed below for your information:

STATE CORPORATION COMMISSION,
Richmond, Va., March 14, 1978.

Re H.R. 10899—International Banking Act of 1978.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN: If the captioned bill, as now amended, should become law, the practical effect would be to foreclose the establishment of branches of foreign banks in any states other than New York, Illinois and California, since it is fairly unrealistic to anticipate that branches of domestic banks will be permitted across state lines anytime within the foreseeable future.

The concept of branching across state lines by domestic banks and the establishment of branches in more than one state are separate and distinct and should be treated differently. The basic purposes of the two and the markets served are distinctly different and this action appears to be an attempt to force the acceptance of nation-wide branching as the price of attracting an opportunity for foreign investment, where such investment might be sought. I believe each issue should be considered on its own merits.

In addition to the foregoing, Section VII of the captioned bill would extend the authority of the Federal Reserve System to state-chartered foreign branches in a discriminatory manner, for which no need has been shown. I believe a choice as to Fed membership should be maintained in every case.

I strongly urge you to oppose Sections V and VII of the bill as now amended when it is presented to the House. I understand that Representative Annunzio (D., Ill.) intends to offer an additional amendment to Section V, which would preserve existing state authority to invite foreign bank branches, whether or not such a bank now has a branch in another state. The amendment would also delete the tie-in arrangement now contained in Section V with respect to the establishment of branches across state lines by domestic banks.

Your support in this matter will be deeply appreciated.

Very truly yours,

SIDNEY A. BAILEY,
Commissioner of Banking.

STATE BANK COMMISSIONER,

Re: H.R. 10899—International Banking Act of 1978

Hon. ROBERT E. BAUMAN,
Cannon Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN BAUMAN: It is my understanding that the above bill is scheduled to come out of the House Rules Committee and be sent to the floor some time next week. I would like to ask your support in opposing Sections 5 and 7 of the bill for the reasons cited.

Section 5 in its present form if it were to become law would have the effect of forcing foreign bank branches to choose a one state location, and under such circumstances they would choose New York to the exclusion of all other States, except possibly California, since the multi-state locations of foreign branches are almost entirely confined to New York and Chicago, Illinois. This would be detrimental to the efforts of any other State which might in the future decide to attract these foreign branches, due to the fact that the bill provides that no state chartered foreign branch could operate outside its home state, unless the laws of the state which it desired to enter would also permit interstate branching of state chartered non-member banks located in the "home" state of the foreign branch.

We have been advised that Representative Frank Annunzio, Democrat Illinois, will offer an amendment to the present Section 5, which would simply preserve the authority which states have had up to this time to invite into their respective areas foreign bank branches, regardless of whether a particular branch of a foreign owned bank is also operating in another State. We would appreciate your support of this amendment, since it would knock out the tie-in arrangement presently set forth in Section 5.

Section 7 as amended by the House Banking Committee on February 23, gives the Fed reserve-setting authority over state chartered foreign branches, agencies and commercial lending companies with worldwide assets of $1,000,000,000. I believe this provision would be discriminatory in that affiliation with the Fed is optional for state chartered domestic banks regardless of size, and that it should be optional for foreign banking institutions, regardless of size. The Fed has made no showing for such reserve setting authority, as set forth in the present bill.

I further understand that the Federal Reserve will sponsor an amendment that would further restrict the state chartered domestic banks. I strongly urge you to oppose this measure as vigorously as possible. In fact, I hope that somebody from the Maryland delegation will propose an amendment eliminating any Federal Reserve supervision, as this appears as the first step in eliminating the dual banking system. This system has provided the competition and flexibility of choice to both consumers and potential bank incorporators.

I truly hope you agree with my positions, and will give it your support. If you have any questions, please do not hesitate to contact me.

Respectfully,

CHARLES A. KNOTT, Jr.,
Acting Bank Commissioner.

DIVISION OF BANKING,
Olympia, Wash., March 7, 1978.

Congressman LLOYD MEEDS,
Federal Building,
Everett, Wash.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN MEEDS: It has come to my attention that very soon the International Banking Act of 1978 will be presented to your House Rules Committee for consideration.

The Bill, as presented, will contain provisions in Section 5 that if passed would be detrimental to alien banking and subsequently international trade in the State of Washington, as well as other states.

The House Subcommittee on Financial Institutions, Supervision, Regulation and Insurance last October accepted amendments to the original Bill (HR 7325) in Section 5 allowing states to retain their current authority to determine whether or not a foreign bank branch could locate in more than one state. The full committee now changed this amendment to provide a tie-in provision that would require a state granting a branch to an alien bank (already situated in another state) to accept branch applications for a domestic state chartered bank from the other state in which the alien bank was doing business. In other words, an alien bank with a branch say in New York, subsequently granted a branch in Washington State would trigger a reciprocity agreement requiring that Washington also accept a branch application from a state chartered domestic bank in New York. Such a provision would serve to severely limit consideration for additional alien banks in the State of Washington.

It is my understanding that only two or three states permit reciprocity branching of domestic banks under very limiting conditions. In these few instances, at least it was the states' desire and not a forced reciprocity such as provided for in this Bill.

The domestic banks in the State of Washington adequately serve the banking needs within the state and, therefore, forced introduction of other states' banks is unwarranted, in my opinon. On the other hand, alien banks granted branch charters in our state are often better able to expedite the international movement of goods and services than are the domestic banks. This is due to the alien banks' unique international networks and close affiliate relationships with multi-national corporations, trading companies and banking associations worldwide.

Should the Bill prevail, as now proposed, through the Rules Committee, state chartered banks in states such as New York, Illinois and California, where most alien banks presently maintain branch offices, would gain an unprecedented monopoly on cross state branching. The concept of cross state branching of states' domestic banks encounters major objections on its own let alone granting a monopoly for such activity to a few states where alien banking activity is currently centered.

Section 7 of the Bill, as cleared by the full committee, provides for the Federal Reserve Bank to set reserve requirements on alien banks of one billion dollars in assets or more. As you may be aware, domestic state chartered banks, regardless of size, have the choice of whether or not they belong to the Federal Reserve System and subject to their reserve setting authority. This Bill, however, provides a size test which I think discriminates against an alien bank operating under state law with respect to their reserves.

I urge you to return the International Banking Bill to the House Committee in view of the provisions contained in Sections 5 and 7 presenting a detrimental effect on our state's economy and well being.

Thank you.

Sincerely,

M. D. EDWARDS,
Supervisor of Banking.

Hon. TENO RONCALIO,

Washington, D.C.

DEAR TENO: With reference to my letter of March 13th concerning my position and that of the Conference of State Bank Supervisors with respect to the International Banking Act of 1978 (H.R. 10899), it may be that with all the material you must read that you have not had time to study the memorandum which I transmitted.

Since this Bill is to be on the floor of the House within a week, may I make two observations. I am in complete support of an amendment to Section 5 which is in the interest of several State Banking Departments which will be introduced by Representative Annunzio, and I would definitely appreciate your support of that amendment.

Conversely, I am opposed to any modification of Section 7. It is understood that spokesmen for the Federal Reserve plan to offer a floor amendment to Section 7 which would broaden the powers of the Federal Reserve on foreign Banks operating with States authority. I would appreciate your opposition to any modification of Section 7.

Although we both know that Wyoming does not permit branch banking, nor do we have any provision at this time for chartering of foreign Banks in the State, there has been some interest by Japanese Banks and it is that we stand with those States which are in the best interests of Wyoming banking currently faced with this problem.

Hon. THOMAS B. EVANS, Jr.
U.S. Representative, Longworth Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. EVANS: I have previously discussed with Rick Eckman of your staff my feelings concerning the International Bank Act of 1977 (HR 7325). I note that the bill is scheduled for a mark-up session before the full Committee on Banking, Finance and Urban Affairs. As a state bank regulator, I much prefer the bill as amended by the House Banking Committee on Financial Institutions Supervision, Regulation and Insurance. I am particularly addressing the amendments made by Rep. Frank Annunzio during the subcommittee sessions.

Section 5, as amended, would leave to the states their current authority to determine whether or not a foreign bank branch could locate in their state. While I have no knowledge of any foreign bank wishing to locate a branch in Delaware, I feel that Delaware should be the one to approve or disapprove such action. The bill, as originally drafted, would probably have foreign banks only in such states as New York and California.

Section 7, as amended, would restrict reserve setting authority and regulatory oversight to the Federal Board for only those foreign banking institutions with a federal charter. This is preferable to the Section 7 in the bill as originally drafted.

I would appreciate your consideration of my feelings as regards this particular piece of legislation.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN E. MALARKEY,
Delaware State Bank Commissioner.●

THE INTERNATIONAL BANKING ACT

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under a previous order of the House, the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. MOAKLEY) is recognized for 5 minutes.

● Mr. MOAKLEY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to join my distinguished colleague from Florida (Mr. PEPPER) in placing in the RECORD collected statements by State banking commissioners expressing their concern over section 5 of the International Banking Act (H.R. 10899).

As the Senator has explained, this provision would restrict virtually all future international banking to the island of Manhattan. Yet the New York banking commissioner opposes this provision as a dangerous and shortsighted precedent.

When this legislation comes to the floor, the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. ANNUNZIO) will seek to defeat the committee amendment. If the gentleman's position is sustained, the effect will be to adopt the subcommittee version which would permit each State legislature to invite international banks to branch into their State. It should be noted that branching could occur only at the affirmative invitation of the State government. Any or all States could bar international bank branching simply by taking no action.

This seems a far fairer approach than the outright prohibition on international banking embodied in the committee substitute. I hope that my colleagues will review the statements of State officials which the Senator and I are inserting in the RECORD. I hope my colleagues will support the effort of the gentleman from Illinois in defeating the committee substitute and letting State government decide how to manage their own local economies.

I strongly support the International Banking Act and the reforms it will produce. But I agree with the State bank commissioners that the bill will be greatly improved by rejecting the committee amendment to section 5.

Re H.R. 10899 International Banking Act of 1978.

Mr. ALEX NEALE,
Conference of State Bank Supervisors,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. NEALE: As Banking Commissioner of Massachuetts, I am very concerned about Section 5(a)(2)(A) of the International Banking Act of 1978 which would effectively take away Massachusetts' present authority to charter a foreign bank branch.

Therefore, I would hope that all members of the Massachusetts delegation would support Representative Annunzio's amendment which would leave Massachusetts free to charter banks as it saw its own interests.

Sincerely,

CAROL S. GREENWALD,
Commissioner of Banks.

Re H.R. 7325—The International Banking Act of 1977.

Hon. BRUCE F. VENTO,
U.S. House of Representatives, Longworth Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE VENTO: I would very much appreciate your support of Section 5 and Section 7 of this Bill as they were amended in subcommittee by Representative Annunzio.

ROBERT A. MAMPEL,
Commissioner of Banks.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE,
Salem, Oreg., March 17, 1978.

Hon. AL ULLMAN,
U.S. Representative, Rayburn House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN ULLMAN: I am told that the International Banking Act of 1978 (House Resolution 10899) is scheduled to go to the floor of the House next Wednesday. I am particularly concerned with Sections 5 and 7 of the Bill because of the immediate effects it would have, upon passage, in our state.

The effect of Section 5, as it is now written, would be to bar further branch activity of foreign banks in the state of Oregon and in other states throughout the nation with the exception of New York and possibly California. Section 5 was removed by the subcommittee of the House Banking Committee but was put back in the full Banking Committee late in February. It would provide that no state chartered foreign branch could operate outside its home state unless the home state authorized interstate branching of domestic state chartered nonmember banks. You can surely see the debilitating effects of this portion of the Bill to the citizens and businesses in Oregon who depend upon financing of exports and imports.

As you are aware, the Canadian Imperial Bank is operating here and has four branches; and The Bank of Tokyo has one branch. They both serve needs that our domestic banks, because of their lack of world-wide contacts, cannot meet. We have under application and approval the Hongkong Shanghai Bank for a branch, and the Nova Scotia Bank for a branch. Each of them would be prohibited as the bill is now written, and one of the branches of the Canadian Imperial Bank would have to be divested. There are also two other foreign banks, one from Canada and one from London that wish to come into Oregon, not to serve domestic accounts, that is household accounts, but to finance letters of credit and drafts drawn against them. Our Legislature spoke to this issue in 1975 and provided the means by which foreign banks could enter the banking climate in Oregon. There was no opposition to this legislation from anyone in the financial community and indeed there was positive support from the banking community.

Section 7, as now amended, places reserve setting authority with the Federal Reserve Bank, which in my view is entirely unwarranted because of the lack of showing that the FED has made in seeking this power. As you are aware, in our state and federal system of checks and balances national banks must be members, state banks may be members, and we see not reason to depart from this long established posture. As a matter of interest to you, the state supervisors in states that have foreign banks have required that their foreign banks submit monthly data to the Federal Reserve for their monetary policy needs, a requirement that is far more stringent than we require for domestic banks.

I would like to ask that you vote against this bill. There is no justification for it, and I have found no support that would not bear scrutiny. Short of this, however, Representative Frank Annunzio of Illinois will be offering an amendment to Section 5 which would preserve the authority which states have had up to this time to invite into their respective areas foreign branches regardless whether a particular branch of a foreign bank is operating in another state. His amendment would knock out the tie-in arrangement presently included in Section 5. I would ask your support of Representative Annunzio's amendments.

There may be efforts on the floor to reinstate into Section 7 provisions which would give the FED examination powers and the right to impose other provisions of the federal law which could be imposed upon member banks. This would amount to giving FED compulsory membership powers over state chartered foreign branches. They don't have it now under state chartered domestic banking institutions which choose not to be members of the FED. To give them this power would be discriminatory relative to state chartered foreign banking institutions. Please resist any such efforts.

I am enclosing a photostat of a summary of the status of this bill prepared by the Conference of State Bank Supervisors which will give you a broader view of the problem. I hope I may have your support in my recommendations. It is key to the future of capital attraction to our state.

Very sincerely yours,

JOHN B. OLIN,
Superintendent of Banks.

STATE OF MONTANA,
DEPARTMENT OF BUSINESS REGULATION,
March 17, 1978.

Hon. MAX S. BAUCUS,
House of Representatives, Cannon House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MAX: I am writing on behalf of the Department of Business Regulation of the State of Montana to urge you to oppose Sections 5 and 7 of H.R. 10899 (the International Banking Act of 1978). These Sections, as currently written, penalize states such as Montana in that we would be prevented from even the possibility of establishing a branch of a foreign bank in the event we chose to do so. Whatever this administration's feelings are on the establishment of a foreign branch, we should at least preserve for ourselves the opportunity to act in such a manner that would best protect our interests.

May I also express the view that the Federal Reserve System would be given power over state chartered banks, which they currently do not have, and which would also not necessarily be in the best interests of state chartered banks in Montana.

As you are aware, Representative Frank Annunzio of Illinois will offer an amendment to the present Section 5 and we would very much appreciate your support of Congressman Annunzio's amendment. This amendment would simply preserve the authority for states which have had up to this time to invite into their respective areas foreign bank branches, regardless of whether a particular branch of a foreign-owned bank is also operating in another state. In other words, the tie-in arrangement would be dropped.

If you desire further information on this bill, I would be happy to either call or write you immediately as time is very short. CSBS, the Conference of State Bank Supervisors, to which Montana belongs, is capable of providing you with substantial information in this area and, in fact, represents Montana's best interests in this particular legislation.

Please let me know if I can be of further assistance. Best personal regards.

Sincerely,

KENT KLEINKOPF,
Director.

STATE OF NEVADA,
SUPERINTENDENT OF BANKS,
March 15, 1978.

Re H.R. 10899—International Banking Act of 1978.

Hon. JAMES SANTINI,
House of Representatives, Longworth House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN SANTINI: At the present time the individual states determine whether foreign banking institutions can or cannot operate within their respective borders. Foreign banking institutions are located principally in New York and California, our nation's leading money centers.

Nevada prohibits any branch offices unless the location of the principal office and the parent bank shall be within the State of Nevada. Sometime in the future the Nevada Legislature may wish to change this statute allowing foreign branching.

The House Banking Committee on February 23 amended Section 5 of this bill (by a 25–18 vote) to provide that no state-chartered foreign branch could operate outside its home state unless the laws of the state which it desired to enter would also permit interstate branching of domestic state-chartered nonmember banks located in the "home" state of the foreign branch.

The net effect of this provision is to legislate the dominance of New York in the international banking field. Why is this? Simply because nearly every foreign branch in the United States has a presence in New York State. Therefore, under this bill, if a state such as Florida, Georgia, etc., wanted to invite into their respective areas a foreign branch already operating in New York, it would have to also permit state-chartered nonmember domestic banks from New York to also come into their states. There is no desire, generally, on the part of states to permit out-of-state domestic banks into their areas, and this would be particularly true of having to permit large domestic banks from New York.

As a result, if this section were to become law, it would have the effect of forcing foreign bank branches to choose a one-state location, and under such circumstances they would choose New York to the exclusion of all other states, except possibly California. This would be detrimental to the efforts of any other state which might in the future desire to attract these foreign branches.

Is it in our national interests to legislate a monopoly in the international banking field for one state—New York—and preempt other states from inviting foreign branches that can stimulate international trade and investment in their respective areas and enlarge their international financial roles?

The claim is made by opponents of the present situation that the multi-state presence of foreign branches gives them an unfair competitive advantage over our domestic banks.

What are the facts: The multi-state locations of foreign branches are almost entirely confined to New York and Chicago, Illinois. New York has 59 foreign branches and Chicago has 29 foreign branches, most of which branches are also in New York. There are only a handful of foreign branches in other states such as Massachusetts, Oregon and Washington. So we are not talking about large numbers of multi-state foreign branches, or many states into which they have gone.

Section VII, Authority of the Federal Reserve System, as amended by the House Banking Committee on February 23 would give the Fed reserve-setting authority over state-chartered foreign branches, agencies and commercial lending companies with worldwide assets of $1 billion.

While this provision is much more palatable to me than the provisions sought by Rep. St Germain in Committee, I am of the position that these provisions are (1) discriminatory, in that affiliation with the Fed is optional for state-chartered domestic banks regardless of size and that it should be optional for foreign banking institutions, regardless of size; (2) the Fed has made no showing that it needs reserve-setting authority over all state-chartered domestic banks, let alone foreign-owned banking institutions.

I urge you to oppose Sections 5 and 7 of the bill for the reasons cited. Rep. Frank Annunzio (D. Ill.) will offer an amendment to the present Section 5. The Annunzio amendment would simply preserve the authority which the states have had up to this time to invite into our respective areas foreign bank branches. I would appreciate your support of the Annunzio amendment.

Sincerely,

JOSEPH O. SEVIGNY,
Superintendent of Banks.

STATE OF MISSOURI,
March 13, 1978.

Re International Banking Act of 1978, H.R. 10899.

Hon. RICHARD BOLLING,
U.S. Representative, House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. BOLLING: It was recently brought to my attention that you may have some influence with respect to the above banking legislation by virtue of your position on the House Rules Committee. I am writing this letter because, as the chief state bank regulator for the State of Missouri, I find one provision of this legislation as amended by the House Banking Committee to be a serious threat to the independence of the State of Missouri in determining its own banking policy.

Section 5 of the bill prohibits a state chartered branch of a foreign bank from operating outside of its home state unless the laws of the state in which it desires to branch would also permit interstate branching of domestic banks. Therefore, a Swiss or Japanese bank which was chartered under the laws of New York or California would be unable to open an office and do business in the State of Missouri unless Missouri threw down its barriers to interstate branching and allowed domestic banks located in California or New York to likewise open offices in Missouri. I should point out that at the present time Missouri does not have any foreign branches or agencies operating within its boundaries. However, we look forward to the time when we will be able to attract such branches and agencies and we do not believe that Missouri should be compelled to abolish its long standing policies on branching in order to attract such foreign banks.

It is my understanding that this section of H.R. 10899 would have the effect of assuring the dominance of New York as the financial center of the United States. Foreign banks would be required to establish no more than one office in the United States and they would naturally choose the State of New York over the State of Missouri or other states. It is my belief that the way should be left open for such banks to open branches in Missouri as well as New York without requiring a complete change in the banking policy of the State of Missouri.

Any assistance you can render in removing this harmful and unnecessary provision from the International Banking Act would be greatly appreciated.

Yours very truly,

EDGAR H. CRIST,
Commissioner of Finance.

STATE OF MICHIGAN,

Re International Banking Act of 1978 (H.R. 10899).

To all House Delegates from Michigan.

DEAR SIRS: I understand that the International Banking Act will come before you soon. There are two sections of the bill that we have a significant interest in from the standpoint of the commerce of the state and the maintenance of our regulatory system. They are sections 5 and 7 of the bill.

We think it is important that the states, if they so desire, be permitted to permit foreign banks to be admitted to their state, even though they have a point of entry through New York or California. This relates to section 5.

We also believe that the regulatory power that the Federal Reserve System is seeking in section 7 is clearly unnecessary.

A memorandum from the Conference of State Bank Supervisors outlining the rationale for our position is attached. Your support will be appreciated.

Sincerely,

RICHARD J. FRANCIS,
Commissioner.

STATE OF NEW JERSEY,
DEPARTMENT OF BANKING,
Trenton, N.J., March 17, 1978.

Re The International Banking Act of 1978 (HR 10899).

Hon. JAMES J. FLORIO,
Longworth House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN FLORIO: The above bill is scheduled tentatively to be debated on the floor of the House of Representatives in the very near future. Because of the serious implications of section 5 of this bill to all States except New York, I would appreciate your support of an amendment to section 5 which will be offered on the floor by Representative Frank Annunzio.

Section 5, as presently written would have the practical effect of forcing all foreign bank branches to choose New York as their sole location in this country. Our State should have the option of inviting all foreign bank branches into the State, if and when it desires to do so, without a "tie-in" provision as now written into section 5. This "tie-in" arrangement would require that should New Jersey want to invite into its area a foreign bank branch already operating in New York, New Jersey would have to also permit a domestic bank from New York to enter New Jersey. The reason for inviting a foreign bank branch is to facilitate international trade and banking matters and our State does not need New York's commercial banks to meet our domestic banking needs. Representative Annunzio's amendments eliminates this tie-in arrangement, which is totally unacceptable to our State.

I would also appreciate your opposing any effort to broaden section 7 of this bill, to give the Federal Reserve Board authority to examine state-chartered foreign bank institutions and to otherwise treatment as "member" banks. The Fed does not have this authority over state-chartered domestic banks that do not choose to be members of the Fed system and it does not warrant such authority over state-chartered foreign banking institutions.

Very truly yours,

ANGELO R. BIANCHI,
Commissioner.

STATE OF NEW MEXICO,
Santa Fe, N. Mex., March 17, 1978.

Hon. HAROLD RUNNELS,
Longworth Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN RUNNELS: We exchanged correspondence back in July of 1977 on H.R. 7325 that is now H.R. 10899 "The International Banking Act of 1977". We expressed certain objections to that legislation at that time, and you concurred with our views.

The bill in question is expected to go to the floor of the House during the week of March 20th, and we harbor the same reservations that we did previously.

We understand that Representative Frank Annunzio is going to propose a floor amendment to cover one of our objections and we would appreciate your support for the Annunzio amendment. We continue to oppose the attempts to give the Federal Reserve Board veto power over state banking departments in determining whether foreign branches or agencies could be organized under state law. We also oppose their being granted the authority to impose reserve requirements on all state-licensed foreign-owned branches or agencies.

Thank you for your continued support and assistance in preventing the further erosion of the state's regulatory authority in these areas.

Best personal regards.

Sincerely,

ARTHUR L. ORTIZ,
Commissioner of Banking.

STATE BANKING DEPARTMENT,
Oklahoma City, Okla., March 17, 1978.

Re International Banking Act of 1977, H.R. 10899

Hon. WES WATKINS,
Cannon Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN WATKINS: The above bill is scheduled to come before the Floor of the House of Representatives in the near future. Section 5, as it was reported out of the full Committee on Banking and Currency, is objectionable to state bank regulators. I would appreciate your support of an amendment to this section that will be offered on the Floor by Representative Frank Annunzio.

Section 5, as it is presently written, has a "tie-in provision" that is unacceptable. This "tie-in provision" would require that if Oklahoma at sometime in the future wanted to invite into our state a foreign bank branch that is operating, say in New York, we would also have to permit a domestic bank from New York to operate in Oklahoma. While we do not need a New York bank to handle our domestic banking needs, it may be desirable at sometime in the future to invite a foreign bank branch to come to our state to facilitate international trade in banking matters but we do not need the "tie-in provision" presently in Section 5.

Mr. Annunzio's amendment would eliminate that objectionable feature. He would also appreciate your opposing any effort to change Section 7 that might broaden the power of the Federal Reserve Board to supervise state chartered foreign banking institutions operating in this country.

Sincerely yours,

D. F. VAN HORN,
Deputy Commissioner.

COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA,
DEPARTMENT OF BANKING,
Harrisburg, Pa., March 16, 1978.

Hon. JOHN P. MURTHA,
U.S. House of Representatives, Cannon Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR JOHN: The House of Representatives will soon consider the International Banking Act of 1978 (H.R. 10899). I wrote to you last year (June 10, 1977) asking for your help in defeating a similar bill, H.R. 7325.

Pennsylvania has recently passed legislation giving foreign banks the right to establish an office in Pennsylvania. Bankers throughout the State have been most helpful in formulating regulations to permit entry and in soliciting foreign bankers who might be interested in coming to the Commonwealth. I believe these bankers and others are aware of the potential for greater employment which could result from any investment foreign banks make in Pennsylvania. This increased employment includes both employees of foreign banks and more significantly expansion of jobs which will result from the lending activity in Pennsylvania of these institutions.

The difficulty with H.R. 10899, as it is presently written, is that it would effectively bar foreign banks from coming into Pennsylvania. There is a provision in the bill which stipulates that any foreign bank which already has an office in any one of the fifty states could enter a new state only if the new state would permit domestic institutions headquartered where the foreign bank already has an office to enter the state. In short, if a Canadian bank which has an office in New York wants to enter Pennsylvania, Pennsylvania could permit that only if it allowed New York based banks to branch into the Commonwealth. The practical effect of this provision would be to limit foreign banks in the United States to one state, probably New York or California.

Representative Frank Annunzio will offer an amendment to Section 5 to delete the objectionable feature. I hope you will be able to support his amendment; otherwise, I am afraid Pennsylvania will be denied the potential expansion of employment which could come as a result of foreign bank entry. If Representative Annunzio's amendment fails, I hope you will vote against H.R. 10899. I view most of the bill as being little more than a power grab by the Federal Reserve in any case, but I believe we could live with it were it not for the interstate branching feature.

This is the issue I discussed with you briefly during the reception for the Pennsylvania Congressional Delegation in Washington on February 27, 1978.

Sincerely,

BILL.

STATE OF SOUTH CAROLINA,
Columbia, S.C., March 17, 1978.

Hon. MENDEL J. DAVIS,
House of Representatives, Rayburn Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. DAVIS: We understand that the International Banking Act of 1978 (H.R. 10899) will be debated next week by the House. As you know, this is a very controversial bill especially since the House Banking Committee voted to amend Sections 5 and 7 of the bill.

We also understand that Representative Frank Annunzio (D., Ill.) will offer an amendment to Section 5 of the bill which will simply preserve the authority states have had up to this time to invite into their respective areas foreign bank branches regardless of whether a particular branch of a foreign-owned bank is also operating in another state. We are asking that you support the Annunzio amendment.

We further understand that the Federal Reserve Board probably will offer an amendment to Section 7 of the bill which will give the Board greater powers over state-chartered foreign branches, agencies, and commercial lending companies than it now has. We ask that you oppose any effort by the Federal Reserve Board to amend Section 7 of the bill.

We appreciate your giving these matters consideration.

Very truly yours,

ROBERT C. CLEVELAND,
Commissioner of Banking.

THE STATE OF UTAH,

Re International Banking Act of 1978 (H.R. 10899).

Congressman GUNN MCKAY,
U.S. House of Representatives, Longworth Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR GUNN: It is my understanding the above bill may be sent to the House Floor for debate within a few days. I would recommend your support of a change in Section 5 of the bill to retain the right of individual states to charter officers of foreign banks within their boarders irregardless of whether the bank has branches operating in other states. (I believe Representative Frank Anunzio will propose an amendment, which I would support to effect this change.)

Please oppose any effort to broaden the authority of the Federal Reserve Board beyond the authority given it under the present language in Section 7 of the bill.

Sincerely,

———— ————,
Commissioner.

Re International Banking Act of 1978 (H.R. 10899).

Hon. J. J. PICKLE,
U.S. House of Representatives, Washington, D.C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE PICKLE: I wish to advise you of my support of the position of the Conference of State Bank Supervisors regarding the subject bill. Attached hereto is a memorandum outlining their position.

I would also ask that you support an amendment to Section 5 of the bill which will be offered by Representative Annunzio. Texas, by its constitution, prohibits any foreign bank from doing business in Texas and if any change is to be made, it should be within the discretion of the voters of Texas to determine what that change will be.

I would appreciate your support in this matter. If you wish for further information, please call me.

Sincerely yours,

STATE OF TENNESSEE,
Nashville, Tenn., March 17, 1978.

Re International Banking Act of 1978 (H.R. 10899).

Hon. ALBERT GORE, JR.,
Longworth House Office Building, Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN GORE: I understand the above bill will soon be debated on the floor of the House of Representatives.

I urge you to support the Amendment to Section 5 of this bill that Representative Frank Annuzio, from Illinois, will offer on the floor of the House. The reasons for asking this are set forth in the attached memorandum prepared by the Conference of State Bank Supervisors, and I support their views.

As you can see from the attached information, Section 5 as now written would legislate a practical monopoly by New York on international banking matters as they pertain to operations carried on by foreign bank branches located in this country. This would be detrimental to Tennessee should we at some time in the future want to invite a foreign branch to come into our state.

In addition, please oppose any effort that might be made on the floor of the House to broaden Section 7 of the bill to give the Federal Reserve additional powers over state chartered foreign banking institutions. It is anticipated that efforts will be made to alter Section 7 to give the Fed (1) power to examine state chartered foreign banking institutions and (2) to impose other provisions of federal law as though they were member banks. These additional powers are unwarranted.

Your consideration and support of these matters will be appreciated.

Cordially yours,

JOE H. HEMPHILL,
Commissioner of Banking.●

FORESTRY IS AN AREA OF MAJOR CONCERN

(Mr. SIKES asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, forestry is an area of major concern for every American. For many it is a livelihood. For others it is a source of wholesome recreation. It is an essential part of our Nation's structure.

Forestry budgets in the National Congress seldom have been sufficiently high to meet the actual need for programs which properly insure sound forestry management and conservation programs.

American Forests is an important national publication which deals primarily with forests, soil, water, wildlife, and outdoor recreation, has editorialized on the sad state of the present forestry budget. This should receive consideration and I submit it for the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD:

WHAT'S NEW AT AFA

The saddest news for forestry in recent years is the President's 1979 fiscal year budget. While we are busy fighting to protect the Forest Service from being reorganized into the Department of the Interior or being broken down into its component parts, we suddenly are confronted with a budget crisis. For some unknown reason, about everything The American Forestry Association stands for is being downgraded by the Administration's Office of Management and Budget. There is no surer or quicker way of crippling an agency or its programs than cutting off or cutting down its funding.

According to budget officers, the most severe reductions in the 1979 USDA budget are in the natural resources area. Why? This is contrary to everything President Carter campaigned for. Some of his greatest support came from environmentalists who welcomed his conservation interest and commitment. Does he realize what his budget officials are doing?

State and Private Forestry programs have been reduced $11.9 million below 1978 levels. Forestry Incentives Payments were cut $5 million, although in all fairness this is the first time FIP has been recommended in the President's budget request. Rural Community Fire Control funds are nowhere to be found in the new budget. Clarke-McNary, Sec. 2, for cooperative fire control matching funds to the states, has been cut $4 million. Cooperative Forest Management is down $3.6 million, and General Forestry Assistance is $3.5 million below this year's appropriation. We have just testified before the House Forestry Subcommittee in support of increases in authorization for all of these State and Private Forestry needs. Each should be increased, not decreased, because they all benefit state and private forest lands. Yet, the Administration seems to be heading in the other direction.

President Carter has declared it his policy to put greater emphasis on helping the small, private, nonindustrial forest owners. He has endorsed a program to accelerate management and production from private forests to take some of the pressures off our public lands. If we are to meet future forest needs, he has said, much of the increased production in goods and services will have to come from the 59 percent of our total forest acreage in private, nonindustrial ownerships. How can the government go opposite directions at the same time? Obviously, it can't, and the 1979 budget is simply incongruous with everything we heard and expected.

Not only have State and Private Forestry programs been slashed, but National Forest programs as well. Forest Research is down $3.6 million; Reforestation and Timber Stand Improvement down $8.9 million; Insect and Disease Control down $6.6 million; Range Management down $6.2 million, and Fish and Wildlife Habitat Management down $2.6 million. To make matters even worse, personnel ceilings of the Forest Service have also been cut for 1979, although a new manpower study is underway. In all, the 1979 Forest Service budget is about $53.8 million below the 1978 current estimate, but there are increases in some areas, such as $7.7 million in timber sales administration and $18.1 million in roads and trails construction. These increases will permit a timber sales program of $11.5 billion board feet from the National Forests in fiscal 1979, the same as this year. The Youth Conservation Corps is continued at the same level as fiscal year 1978, at $60 million.

Fortunately, the President's budget is only a recommendation or request. It is the Congress that appropriates federal funds. Many times in the past, Congress has disagreed with OMB and the Administration. We all share a sense of urgency for a balanced budget, but why does natural resources management have to bear the brunt? It is poor economy in the long run and contrary to what we expected from the Carter administration. (W.E.T.) ●

WHATEVER HAPPENED TO PATRIOTISM?

(Mr. SIKES asked and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, patriotism is a matter of primary importance to our Nation; yet patriotism somehow no longer receives the emphasis which once was accorded this important subject. Patriotism, pride in America, belief in our Nation and its destiny, must always be top place in our thinking if we are to survive as a nation.

The Air Force Times of February 20, 1978, dealt in a very appropriate manner with this subject. I submit the publication's comment on patriotism for reprinting in the RECORD:

WHAT EVER HAPPENED TO . . .

Time was when a thing called patriotism ranked high among the reasons a person might give for serving in the armed forces. It had to do with the feeling that the country was worth defending and that the job was important.

An honest, unblushing love of country didn't used to be a source of embarrassment to people.

Now, patriotism apparently is not a very salable commodity in the eyes of the people whose job it is to attract young recruits. Education, benefits and the material things of life appear to be the big sellers.

There are plenty of experts around who will tell you where that old lump-in-the-throat feeling went. But they don't seem to agree.

Some say it began to ebb with WW II, when people became conscience-stricken about the use of the A-bomb and expired as a new generation grew up feeling that no country was much worth admiring—including their own.

Some say that patriotism died in Vietnam along with about 46,000 Americans, while a succession of national leaders debated whether we should fight to win or quit and get out.

Some say the feeling just faded away somewhere between the revelations of corruption in high office and the suspicions of hanky-panky in big business.

A few hopelessly optimistic souls will tell you there's still a little of that old 4th-of-July sentiment around if anybody wanted to tap it.

Oh, it's not likely, they concede, that we could rekindle anything like the chauvinism of the last century which had our forebears shouting, "My country, right or wrong." We're unlikely to revive that line and it's probably just as well. We've always preferred the philosophy that you back the country when it's right and, when it is wrong, do what you can to help fix it.

If, as the optimists believe, there's still a chance to rekindle some of the old sentiment, how do you get it started? We have the feeling that it must begin at the top.

We had hoped that this new President, having had some naval service and being strong on the matter of morality, would have something to say about patriotism—even about the dedication of the people who follow the profession of arms.

So far, however, the President has had curiously little to say about the citizens' obligation to the nation and even less to say about the people who meet the obligation in service. After a few superficial compliments last year to a Pentagon gathering, he launched into a discussion of the high cost of service retirements and the observation that the government shouldn't be subsidizing commissaries.

He has spoken a good deal about defense economy, but has shown little appreciation for the people involved. We combed his budget statement for some recognition of those people. The defense budget, it said, "is prudent and tight." It spoke of outlays for modernization and said the nation's armed forces "must always stand sufficiently strong to deter aggression and to assure our security." Nothing in there about the human beings who do the job.

Congressional leaders, with a few notable exceptions, seems no more inclined to talk about the subject. They will wax poetic about the nation in campaign speeches, but rarely elsewhere. They will mention service people in terms of what their pay is costing the taxpayers, but rarely in recognition of the services rendered.

We don't suggest that young Americans would come flocking to the colors after one kind word from the White House or Congress about the importance of a dedicated military establishment. We do think, however, that sustained support by national leaders would go a long way toward turning national attitudes around.

The country has survived and thrived, after all, because past Americans saw fit to pay their dues—some with interest—by serving the country in uniform or otherwise. We happen to think that many more would be of similar mind if someone made it clear that service to the country still is considered one of the higher callings. Might be even be a suitable topic for a fireside chat one of these nights. We'd listen, anyway.●

TIME FOR A REALISTIC APPROACH TO RHODESIAN PROBLEMS

(Mr. SIKES asked for and was given permission to extend his remarks at this point in the RECORD and to include extraneous matter.)

● Mr. SIKES. Mr. Speaker, a more realistic approach by the United States to the efforts to achieve a peaceable settlement in Rhodesia is clearly indicated. Our policy on the Salisbury accord has been ambiguous and murky. The administration does not commend it, nor does it offer encouragement. In effect, the President has refused to endorse the internal leaders who propose a solution respecting democracy and human rights, while, in effect, the United States continues to support the external leaders who openly proclaim the only solution is war, who have openly rejected the idea that the rights of white Rhodesians also should be protected, and who appear headed not for democracy, but for racism and authoritarian dictatorship with Russian sponsorship.

Each passing day the U.S. policy makes it more difficult for us to effectively participate in bringing about democratic rule in Rhodesia without communist domination.

This subject is discussed in a highly realistic manner by James Burnham in the National Review. I submit it for reprinting in the RECORD:

[From the National Review, Mar. 31, 1978]

BLACK, WHITE, GREY—THE PROTRACTED CONFLICT

(By James Burnham)

If men were reasonable creatures, there would have been universal rejoicing at the Rhodesian "internal settlement" agreed to by white Ian Smith and black Abel Muzorewa, Ndabaningi Sithole, and Jeremiah Chirau. Not that it is an ideal solution: a negotiated agreement is always a pisaller, a compromise among diverse, in part conflicting aims and interests. However, this Salisbury accord is as good as reasonable creatures could expect to emerge from so sticky a morass. Moreover, its terms satisfy, generally speaking, what the many parties, local and global, to the Rhodesian confusion have professed to be their criteria for a satisfactory solution.

For better or worse, the most actively publicized of these criteria has been "one man, one vote." The accord embraces this criterion fully en principe (as the French are fond of saying); it was Ian Smith's capitulation to this principe that made the Salisbury negotiation possible. Under the terms of the accord, there will be a temporary restriction in applying the one-man-one-vote principle. Although everyone of 18 years or more will from the beginning have the right to vote, 28 seats in the new one-hundred-seat parliament will be reserved for whites, which means that during those transitional ten years white votes will count more than black votes. Reasonable persons, having in mind the post-independence history of the new African nations and noting that the three black nationalist leaders are willing to accept it, might judge that this temporary brake on all-out one man, one vote makes good sense. If Zimbabwe can integrate the expertise, money, energy, and international connections of the Rhodesian whites into its new structure, no one can doubt that its citizens, both black and white, are going to be a lot better off than if the whites pull an Angola.

BLACK AND/OR WHITE

It is not only material values that might recommend the Salisbury accord to reasonable persons. It shows up rather well on the human rights scale, about which we have heard so much of late. The accord came out of the peaceful discourse of men, not the barrel of a gun. It is democratic in a basic sense, not only in its provisions for the new government but in the fact that it was negotiated by the three black leaders whom, according to observers, a big majority of the blacks support and the democratically chosen leader of the whites. It envisions an African rarity, a non-racist state. It recognizes that, if rights are in truth human, they must hold for everyone, even whites.

It is true that, even on the most optimistic appraisal, the path of the Salisbury accord will be rough and heavily mined. Any or all of the four initiators could sabotage it out of ambition, trickiness, cowardice, or corruption. Many Rhodesian whites have not reconciled themselves to the loss of racist privilege. Many Rhodesian blacks want revenge rather than justice. The guerrilla and terrorist armies, supported and sheltered by the neighboring states, are in the field.

Suppose, though, that the United States and Britain threw their support behind the Salisbury accord—not every detail, but the general course it maps. This would mean dropping the sanctions (pace the UN) and announcing a readiness to supply the transitional black-white government, about to be formed under the terms of the accord, with relevant weaponry to assure Zimbabwe's defense and security. Even as things stand, many of the Mugabe-Nkomo followers may decide to return home and go along with the accord. A positive Anglo-American initiative would surely strengthen that trend, and would thus minimize the chance of large-scale fighting.

Going along with the general course, the perspective, of the accord would not mean endorsing every move and project of the internal quadrumvirate. It would, rather, give the U.S. and Britain a powerful leverage that would help swing events toward a just and successful outcome. They would be able to propose, indeed command, procedures and supervision that would convincingly guarantee the fairness of the election. They could make sure that the Mugabe-Nkomo followers both within and outside Zimbabwe are offered an honorable chance to abandon civil war and join in the peaceful building of their transformed nation.●

TABLE II.—LIST OF CONTRACTUAL ACTIONS WITH ACTUAL OR POTENTIAL COST OF $50,000 OR MORE TAKEN PURSUANT TO PUBLIC LAW 85-804 TO FACILITATE THE NATIONAL DEFENSE JANUARY TO DECEMBER 1977

Name and location of contractor	Actual or estimated potential cost	Description of product or service	Justification
Amendments without consideration:
Army:
Dixie Tool & Die Co., Inc., Gadsden, Ala.	$2,305,296	Periscope mounts, modification kits etc., for M-60 tank.	A negotiated multiyear contract was awarded in July 1975 for 7 components of the M-60 tank. The contractor immediately began having technical difficulties. The components being produced are necessary for the continued production of M-60 tanks. The Army Armament Material Readiness Command estimates that an average of 100 tanks per month will be manufactured over the next year. The costs associated with delay in production are estimated at $10,000 per tank. Without relief the contractor may fail and it will take approximately 10 to 12 mo to reprocure these items. It is determined that continued performance of this contract is essential to the national defense.
Kellett Corp., Willow Grove, Pa.	667,285	S-390 and S-393, electrical shelters.	This conractor was granted relief in the amount of $358,032 on Aug. 29, 1974 (calendar year 1974 report) and $688,833 on Sept. 30, 1975 (Calendar year 1975 report). Payments authorized in September 1975 were suspended in November 1975 due to the fact that the appropriation involved was over obligated. Lacking sufficient funds, the contractor stopped work on Jan. 16, 1976. Another contractor has been found for the S-390 shelters but the unit price is excessive. 2 other contractors who have been awarded a contract for the S-393 shelters have gone bankrupt attempting to perform. Apparently Kellett is the only contractor for these items. The ECOM Contract Adjustment Board concluded that the sole reason which caused Kellett to seek supplemental relief was the inability of the Government to implement the decision of September 1975 in a timely manner. It is determined that the productive capability of the contractor has been and continues to be impaired as a consequence of losses experienced under these contracts.
Ayer & Son, Inc., New York, N.Y.	430,433	Attorneys fees and other expenses incurred with litigation in terminating a subcontract with Naticnal Varsity Club, Inc.	The National Varsity Club, a subcontractor for Ayer, performed recruiting services on requests made directly to them by various Government officials without a written contract or delivery order. Ayer was unable to manage this subcontract due to these direct communications. Officials of the Recruiting Command, without proper contracting officer authority, directed Ayer to terminate the National Varsity Club program. As a result, National Varsity filed suit against Ayer for breach of contract. The motion of Ayer to dismiss the case because there had been no contract was denied as the court indicated there had been an implied contract. It was found that the contractors loss resulted from Government actions and that considerations of fairness make appropriate the granting of relief.
Shuey Aircraft, Inc., Anaheim, Calif.	57,231	Connecting rods for M48 and M88 vehicles.	Contract was awarded in June 1975 for 1,276 connecting rods at a unit cost of $41.26. Shuey has requested relief on the grounds of a mistake in submission of their bid as they failed to include the cost of tooling. There is no evidence of knowledge of the mistake on the part of the Government. A balance of 349 pieces remain to be delivered. The average monthly demand for connecting rods for the past 25 mo is 61. The lead time for procurement is 15 mo. A new solicitation was opened in November 1976 and the bids ranged from $68 to $297 and delivery time 360 to 390 days. While Shuey's continued existence is not essential to the national defense, the continued performance of this contract, however, is essential.
Navy:
Sysdyne, Inc., San Diego, Calif.	109,937	Engineering support services, MK-46 torpedo program.	In January 1974, a contract was awarded for engineering support services for the Naval Undersea Center, Pasadena, Calif. The contract estimated $409,000 worth of work during 1974 while actual orders totaled approximately $68,000. In 1975, the estimate was $126,000 with $57,000 actual. During this time, orders that should have been given to Sysdyne were placed elsewhere. The impact of the Navy estimate, and actual work performed was inexcusably deficient and little was done to minimize the impact on Sysdyne, a very small firm without the necessary capital to sustain the losses which resulted. It is the opinion of the Board that Sysdyne sustained a loss as a result of Government action.
Formalization of informal commitments:
Army:
British Army Staff, British Defence Staff, Washington, D.C.	67,683	260 rounds of ammunition expended in expended in testing a British light gun.	Sec. 122 of the Basic Standardization Agreement 1964 (BSA 1964) entered into by the United States, United Kingdom, Canada, and Australia authorizes loans on a non-reimbursable basis between the armies of the countries when such loans are in the interest of standardization. Since 1970, the United Kingdon has been developing a 105 mm light gun (L118). Plans were made with the United Kingdom for testing of the gun with a view toward possible procurement of the weapon by the U.S. Army. A loan agreement was entered into in June for the use of 2 guns, but it did not specify which party was to pay for the ammunition. A formal contract could not be executed until funds became available for obligation, and in the meantime the ammunition was expended. The Army Contract Adjustment Board found that an informal agreement had been made by the Army to reimburse the United Kingdom for 160 of the 777 rounds needed for such testing and that the United Kingdom had furnished the ammunition in good faith with the understanding that such payment would be made.

Name and location of contractor	Actual or estimated potential cost	Description of product or service	Justification
Navy: Hermes, Ltd., Via Sedile di Porto, 80134 Naples, Italy.	85,000	59 forged steel anchor shackles	As a result of severe storm damage, the aircraft carrier USS Independence, was scheduled for emergency repair in the port of Naples on Apr. 25, 1977. A buoy modification plan resulted from the need to bring the Independence into the inner harbor in this instance. It was not until after hours on Friday, Apr. 22, that an order was placed with Hermes (the only contractor who could satisfy this requirement), to deliver the shackles on Sunday, Apr. 24, to be ready by Monday morning. Normal procurement procedures were not followed in this instance because of the urgency of the requirement and the last minute identification of the exact number and type required.
Correction of mistakes: Air Force: Northrop Worldwide Aircraft Services.	159,583	Sick leave and paid holidays for employees.	Request arose from a time and materials contract to provide immediate level maintenance on Vietnamese Air Force F-5 aircraft and associated on-the-job training for VNAF technicians at Bien Hoa Air Base, Vietnam, from October 1973, through December 1974. The provisions for sick leave and paid holidays should have been included in the hourly rate and not billed separately. Because the contractor had not had previous experience in Vietnam and could not project the costs to be incurred from sick leave and Vietnamese holidays (not worked), these items were not included in the hourly rate. It was agreed these could be treated separately. The definitized contract failed to include the terms for recovery of these items that were agreed on during the negotiations.
Residual powers: Army: Vogue Instrument Corp., Richmond Hill, N.Y.	783,097		In July 1970, the Navy terminated Vogue for default on a page printer contract. The lengthy ASBCA appeal concluded in a decision in February 1974 that the termination for default be converted to a termination for convenience. This was followed by a protracted period during which a settlement was finally reached in January 1976. Vogue contends that the Navy's action in terminating them for default was a major contribution to their financial downfall. The Army's action in suspending funds owed as a part of the termination settlement caused an adverse impact on Vogue by inhibiting its ability to compete for and obtain business. In addition, there was evidence that Vogue's impaired financial condition contributed to its difficulties and losses sustained on the contracts in respect of which this relief was requested. Presently Vogue's financial situation is such that it cannot continue in business without a grant of relief. In the light of the extensive amount of additional information received, and after finding that Vogue has a history of successful manufacture of complex technology devices and that it would be desirable to retain Vogue as a viable second source for ballistic computers and distribution boxes, the Board determined that the circumstances warranted the grant of relief.
Air Force: Davidson Optronics, Inc. West Covina, Calif.	59,816		Company alleged that it sustained a total loss of $3,972,244 in the performance of 2 Army contracts and are facing bankruptcy. On the theory of essentiality to the national defense, the contractor requested relief in the amount of $2,402,812. Davidson presented its case in March 1977, and the financial data submitted was not complete. The contractor was given 60 days in which to reconstruct his records so that the Government could make a decision, Based upon recommendations that Davidson's capabilities were vital to the national defense, the Air Force Contract Adjustment Board made an interim decision that it was in the Government's best interest to make available additional funds up to $100,000 during this time to prevent the plant from closing during the 60-day period. $59,816 was made available to the contractor. After examination of additional information subsequently supplied to the Board, it concluded that Davidson was no longer essential to the national defense and thereupon issued a final decision denying the requested relief.

Contingent liabilities—Provisions to indemnify contractors against liabilities on account of claims for death or injury or property damage arising out of nuclear radiation, use of high energy propellants or other risks not covered by the contractor's insurance program were included in 88 contracts (the potential cost of these liabilities cannot be estimated inasmuch as the liability to the Government, if any, will depend upon the occurrence of an incident as described in the indemnification clause). Items procured are generally those associated with nuclear-powered vessels, nuclear armed guided missiles, experimental work with nuclear energy, handling of explosives or performance in hazardous areas]

EXTENSIONS OF REMARKS

CONGRESSMAN PAUL SIMON PRAISES LEADERSHIP OF HOUSE AND SENATE BUDGET COMMITTEES

HON. JOHN BRADEMAS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, I believe that Members of both the House and Senate will read with great interest the following newsletter, "P.S. Washington", by our distinguished colleague, the Hon. PAUL SIMON of Illinois, concerning the outstanding leadership given to the House and Senate Budget Committees by three other distinguished colleagues, the Hon. ROBERT GIAIMO of Connecticut, chairman of the House Budget Committee; the Hon. EDMUND S. MUSKIE of Maine, the chairman of the Senate Budget Committee; and the Hon. HENRY BELLMON of Oklahoma, the ranking minority member of the Senate Budget Committee.

Mr. SIMON's newsletter, a weekly column, follows:

BUDGET COMMITTEE LEADERS

"Can we make the budget process work?" is a question the chairman of the House Budget Committee, Rep. Robert Giaimo of Connecticut, often asks privately—and sometimes in public—as he sees the House and Senate occasionally act with almost no concern for the fiscal implications of its actions.

In 1974 Congress passed legislation creating the House and Senate Budget Committees, primarily with two purposes in mind: first, to restrain spending, and second, to set priorities.

The first of those two, restraining spending, we have worked on with limited success. For those who see the Budget Committees as failures in holding back spending, let me assure you that the deficit would be many billions greater were it not for the limiting factor of the Budget Committees. We may not have done all we should, but deficits have been reduced substantially and the fires of inflation have been dampened a little.

The second function of our committees—setting priorities—has not been grasped fully and probably will not be until the two committees start to go into five-year projections rather than one-year projections. That appears to be coming. (Rep. John Conyers of Michigan—not a member of our committee—has done more to prod us in the right direction or setting priorities than any other member of Congress.)

To the degree the House and Senate Budget Committees have been successful during my limited time on the House committee, the credit must go to three people: Rep. Robert Giaimo of Connecticut, Senator Ed Muskie of Maine and Senator Henry Bellmon of Oklahoma.

All three are well over six feet tall, but their stature in Congress comes from their courage and substance, not their height.

Giaimo, the son of Italian immigrant parents knows government expenditures from his seat on the Appropriations Committee where he specializes in the defense area. He is plain-spoken in his comments in debate and in private conversation with his colleagues. He is respected in the House, and his voice on issues is listened to, though often he and the rest of us on the Budget Committee get outvoted.

Muskie, long prominent on the national scene, needs no introduction But as chairman of the Senate Budget Committee he has found his niche, and the soft-spoken Maine accent conceals a basic toughness which his present post requires. He has emerged as one of the powerful figures in the Senate.

No less a contribution has been made by a quiet Oklahoma Republican Senator who is not widely known around the nation, but has shown amazing courage and leadership in Budget matters and in other areas. I mean no disrespect to my House colleagues when I say there is no counterpart to Senator Bellmon in the House.

If a secret vote were to be taken among Senators and House members of both parties on who in our two bodies is making a substantial contribution to the nation, Senator Bellmon's name would emerge high on the list—perhaps to the surprise of many who would look to those who get their faces on television more often.

There is no way the nation can adequately thank these three men. Their contribution has been—and continues to be—immense.

Perhaps I can say "thank you" in a small way by telling the people of Southern Illinois about them.●

CIVIL SERVICE REFORM

HON. LEE H. HAMILTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. Speaker, it is time to overhaul the civil service to make the vast Federal work force more competent, more efficient, and more responsive to the President's direction and the ordinary citizen's needs.

President Carter has just submitted to Congress the most sweeping reform of the civil service ever proposed. The initiative is the centerpiece of the President's Government reorganization program. He wants to make it easier to hire, assign, and fire Federal employees and to reward top civil servants who do their job well. As the President says, he is trying to put merit back into the merit system and the work ethic back into the public's business.

The present civil service code is a 21-volume tangle of obscure rules and regulations. Procedures for firing incompetent employees are so cumbersome that they are almost worthless to Federal managers. Since it can take up to 3 years to discharge someone for good cause, it is hardly surprising that only 223 people were separated from the Government for poor performance last year. A Cabinet Secretary recently told me that he simply could not get rid of a high-salaried, incompetent worker and had ordered that no task of any kind be assigned to the worker in the hope of shaming him into retirement. Promotion policies are just as bad. Pay raises have become virtually automatic. In 1977 only 600 persons were denied a merit increase out of millions who were eligible. Such promotion policies stifle initiative, reward mediocrity, and pay some bureaucrats very handsomely for doing very little.

The President's plan would create an elite corps of 9,000 top Federal managers who would trade job security for a chance at higher pay. The percentage of political appointees in such positions would remain as it is, but directors of agencies would have more discretion in placement. The plan would establish a fair and comprehensive system for protecting employees against abuses by splitting the Civil Service Commission into two agencies—one in the White House to manage the bureaucracy itself and the other an independent agency to protect employee rights and privileges—and by shielding dissident workers who "blow the whistle" on Government waste and corruption. The plan would also cut back to 10 years the lifetime advantages in hiring and job retention now given to nondisabled veterans and would eliminate the preferential hiring of senior military officers, making it more difficult for them to "double-dip." Finally, the plan would streamline rules for the hiring of women, minorities, and the handicapped and would permit more decision-making in agencies and regional Federal offices.

The adoption of the plan is by no means assured. In fact, the President has already negotiated for a year just to get his proposal before Congress. Other Presidents have tried to reorganize the bureaucracy without notable success, and they have quickly learned that many obstacles block the path to reform. Bureaucratic passions are aroused, various groups are unhappy with the weakening of their preferences, and many people fear that the effort to crack down on a small minority of shiftless or unproductive employees erodes legitimate rights and privileges. The plan does give Federal workers broader collective bargaining rights, but the unions are still divided on it. The only unshakable ally of the plan is the general public. Many citizens have become weary and resentful of a bureaucracy that forever costs more and yields less.

It needs to be emphasized that the real problem is the civil service, not the civil servant. Most Federal employees perform with integrity and their work is marked by competence and dedication. No one is more concerned than they with the Government's inability to deliver on its promises. No one is more upset then they with the incompetent worker who tarnishes their image. The President's plan should be seen as a sincere attempt to improve the civil service, not as an attack on the civil servant. Federal employees should find their legitimate rights and privileges better protected under the plan, for surely the conscientious employee would benefit from a system that gave him high marks for a job well done. Only the incompetent employee would have less job security.

Few issues are more important than the competence of government. If people begin to see that the Government is trying to set its house in order, then some disillusionment with government may be dispelled. Consequently, I believe that the President's proposal is long overdue and should be approved. Because even the best organized government can only be as efficient as the people who work in it, this proposal may be one of the most significant to come before Congress in years. The plan may not be perfect, but Congress will have the chance to examine every line of it and make any changes that may be necessary. Given the choice between the bureaucracy as it is and the bureaucracy as it might be, I am hopeful that most Congressmen will vote for a change. If the plan were enacted, I would expect to see a more competent, efficient, and responsive Federal Government—perhaps even a Government worthy of the people it serves.●

CHILD HEALTH CARE PLANNING

HON. JOHN L. BURTON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I wish to take this opportunity to bring to the attention of this body, on behalf of the American Academy of Pediatrics, recent developments in the area of health planning. As you are well aware, amendments to the Health Planning Act of 1974 have been introduced in both the House and Senate, and subcommittee hearings on those bills have already been held.

The American Academy of Pediatrics prides itself for its response to the request in Public Law 93-641 for provider participation in the development of health systems plans, annual implementation plans and State health plans. The Academy feels that the following letter from Harry P. Cain, II, director, Bureau of Health Planning and Resources Development, Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, recognizes that fact, and it offers its services and resources for use in future health planning efforts.

The letter follows:

DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH, EDUCATION, AND WELFARE,
Hyattsville, Md., December 21, 1977.

To: Health Systems Agencies, State Health Planning and Development Agencies, Statewide Health Coordination Council.

Subject: Child Health Care Planning.

Recently some of my staff and I met with representatives of the American Academy of Pediatrics (AAP) regarding child health care consideration in the development of Health Systems Plans and Annual Implementation Plans. The purpose of this program information letter is to acquaint you with the AAP's interest in working with us in implementing the health planning program.

In response to the National Health Planning and Resources Development Act, the Academy developed two documents for its member AAP Chapters concerned with child health planning:

"A Handbook on Child Health Planning for AAP Chapters."

"A Sample Child Health Plan for AAP Chapters"

These documents have been disseminated to the individual AAP Chapters throughout the country. AAP officials stated that they believe that most of their Chapters will want to participate in planning for child health services and that the Chapters may be willing to make these documents available to the HSAs. They may be willing to help in other ways as well; for example, they can serve as a resource for data and information on child health in their area.

We have reviewed the two documents and while they do not conform in their entirety to our guidance on plan development, (nonquantifiable goals are used), and while many may disagree with some recommendations, we think you may well find the documents useful. We also encourage you to take advantage of the AAP's interest in plan development activities.

The Academy provided us with a list of the names and addresses of each AAP Chapter Chairman. A copy is enclosed for your reference.

Finally, I wish to take this opportunity to remind you that health plans must be responsive to the unique needs of the residents of the area for which the plans are developed. In providing guidance on this requirement, the Bureau has made every effort to ensure that planning agencies have the flexibility required to develop plans which respond to local or State priorities and needs. When identifying the unique needs of your area, I urge you to consider the special needs of children. I am sure we all agree that this population subgroup's health status and health service requirements deserve careful thoughts.

PHILADELPHIA PORT AREA DEVELOPMENT GROUP ENDORSES MORE FUNDING FOR NAVIGATION PROJECTS

HON. ROBERT W. EDGAR

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. EDGAR. Mr. Speaker, Mr. William Lewis, a resident of Springfield, Pa., has brought to my attention views of an area port development group with respect to funding of five navigation projects. This group is the Joint Executive Committee for the Improvement and Development of the Philadelphia Port Area, and is chaired by Paul Lane Ives, Jr. The committee is the voice of 21 civic and trade associations for the promotion of navigation improvements in the Philadelphia port area. Member organizations include the Delaware County Chamber of Commerce, the Delaware Valley Council, and the Port of Philadelphia Maritime Society. Organized in 1888, the committee has encouraged Delaware River navigation projects, and projects on river tributaries and on the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal.

I would like to share the views of the committee with my colleagues:

The Ports of Philadelphia rank first among East Coast ports in international waterborne commerce handled and second among these ports in number of ship calls. In 1977 it is estimated that the Port handled over 77 million tons of international cargoes. During the same period 4,339 merchant ships called at the Port. This activity generated an estimated $3 billion into the economy of the tri-state Delaware Valley region.

The following table outlines those navigation projects which we consider to be inadequately funded; indicating the amounts now in the FY 1979 budget and the amounts which we recommend be added to insure that waterborne commerce to this port area continues to move in a safe and expeditious manner:

Project	Fiscal year 1979 budget	Additional amount needed
Delaware River, Philadelphia to the Sea	$9,483,000	$8,600,000
Delaware River, Philadelphia to Trenton	1,543,000	520,000
Chesapeake and Delaware Canal	6,286,000	2,895,000
Wilmington Harbor	902,000	500,000
Delaware River Dredging Disposal Study, Pa., N.J., and Del	100,000	25,000
Total	.....	12,540,000

Included in the monetary benefits derived from port operations are those funds collected by the Federal Government as a result of Customs collections on waterborne commerce. In 1977, U.S. Customs collections at the Ports of Philadelphia reached an all time high of $260 million. Obviously, in order to keep the Ports of Philadelphia fully operative in the light of the increasing size of vessels using its waterways, it behooves the Federal Government to also protect its monetary interest in this Port by appropriating the additional $12.54 million requested herein.

PHILADELPHIA TO THE SEA

No funds have been provided in the FY '79 Budget for maintaining the two principal Delaware River anchorages—Marcus Hook and Mantua Creek—used by deep laden petroleum and chemical tankers and ore and other bulk carriers. These anchorages were authorized by the Congress in 1958 for the safety which they offer to deep draught vessels that transit in a relatively narrow and sometimes congested ship channel. A vessel scheduling her transit on the rising tide, as ninety percent of these vessels must, cannot anticipate conditions, perhaps as much as 130 miles upriver—fog can set in, engine or steering problems can occur, and a northwest wind will tend to reduce the depth of water available. These are all unknowns which may be encountered and which create hazards to the vessel and her crew.

A study recently conducted by The Philadelphia Maritime Exchange disclosed that 20 percent of Delaware River ship traffic carries draughts 36 feet or deeper. Vessels carrying draughts in excess of 36 feet cannot now utilize a Dealware River anchorage because they are not being maintained to project dimensions. Needless to say, such risks should not be acceptable, nor justified on the basis of economic terms.

The Philadelphia District, U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, has a capability to utilize $5,900,000 for maintenance dredging of Marcus Hook Anchorage to its full project dimensions. The Corps also has a capability of $1,700,000 to perform maintenance dredging of Mantua Creek Anchorage to a depth of 37 feet over a 1400 foot width. While neither the depth nor width in the latter anchorage is satisfactory to meet full safety needs on the Delaware River, this would improve on the present situation, and we strongly urge that the necessary steps be taken to add these sums to the President's Budget.

In addition to the need for the vitally important anchorage funding, we should like to recommend that an additional $1,000,000 be appropriated under this project to cover additional hopper dredging.

DELAWARE RIVER, PHILADELPHIA TO TRENTON

This project, in the vicinity of Tioga Marine Terminal, was first requested in 1966 and authorized in 1976. It provides for dredging of a maneuvering area and a turning area adjacent to the existing 40 foot channel. The maneuvering area and turning area would be 36 feet deep. There are no funds in the President's FY 1979 Budget for this work. The Corps' FY 1979 capability for this work is $60,000.

There is an urgent need for modification of this approximately one mile area to permit ships to turn safely into and out of the busy Tioga Terminal and to accommodate the substantial volume of through traffic. The construction of the maneuvering area was accomplished by local interests during the time the site was being constructed for the Tioga Marine Terminal. Only minor construction remains, primarily in the turning basin area.

This is an exceptionally busy segment of the Delaware River. Waterborne commerce statistics issued by the Corps of Engineers indicate that in 1976, the latest year in which statistical information is available, 15,626,657 tons moved over the waterway between Allegheny Avenue and Trenton. During 1977, Tioga Marine Terminal handled 528 vessels and 1.117.000 tons of cargo. Container traffic for 1977 increased 24.7% over the prior year and there is every indication that the growth will continue. Because of the inordinate delay toward the achievement of the modification, the port is in danger of losing the operators of the new and larger containerships which are coming on the water in greatly increasing numbers. The channel at Tioga Marine Terminal is 400 feet wide but the containerships are approaching lengths of 1000 feet.

The Joint Executive Committee recommends an appropriation of $60.000 in the Corps' FY 1979 Budget to permit initiation of the necessary design work which must precede construction.

Also, we respectfully ask that an additional $440,000 be appropriated for this project for maintenance dredging of the upper river. This will permit the Corps to fully meet its capability in order to properly maintain this busy section of the waterway.

CHESAPEAKE AND DELAWARE CANAL IMPROVEMENT PROJECT

A ship will save 294 nautical miles using the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal during a transit from Philadelphia to Baltimore. In terms of hours, a ship transit via the Canal is accomplished in approximately eight hours compared to approximately twenty-six hours if the vessel was to use the "outside" route between the two ports. These are highly significant savings and when the project to deepen the waterway from twenty-seven feet to thirty-five feet and widen it from two hundred and fifty feet to four hundred and fifty feet was authorized in 1954, it was determined that the savings to justify this construction were twice the anticipated costs.

Construction on the C & D Canal improvement project began in 1962. The modernization program provides for a channel depth of 35 feet and a 450 foot width over the full length of the Canal. The project is now nearing completion, following an expenditure of $99.6 million. However, environmental objections to overboard disposal have delayed this important project for several years. As a result, minimum depths in the 35' western approach channel have deteriorated to 26'. At this limited depth, the Canal is only marginally functional for moderate sized vessels and actually non-functional for many of the larger containerships that dominate in the general cargo trades.

There is considerable optimism that in the year ahead environmentalists will accept a program to allow expansion of overboard disposal areas; permitting dredging to at least 32 feet in Fiscal Year 1979. With this in mind, we urge the Congress to appropriate an additional $2,400,000 for contract maintenance dredging in upper Chesapeake Bay.

Following an investment of nearly $100 million, the controlling depth for a ship passage through this wateway is approximately 26 feet. This is no more than the depth available to shipping back in 1962 when work on the improvement project began. Although the improvement project was justified on the basis of a 2:1 benefit/cost ratio, the benefits cannot be realized until the project is completed. We strongly urge the Congress to appropriate all necessary funding in order to bring this project to a speedy conclusion.

Other important work associated with this project that has not received funding in the FY '79 Budget is the following:

Repairs—Night Lighting System	$250,000
Construction—TV/Microwave Tower	75,000
Dredging Contract—Chesapeake City Anchorage Basin & Delaware City Bridge Channel	170,000

While not as important as the maintenance dredging in the western approach channel, these items are necessities to insure maximum efficiency in the operation of this multimillion dollar project. We therefore urge their inclusion in the appropriation figure.

WILMINGTON HARBOR

No funds have been provided in the President's FY '79 Budget for the badly needed rehabilitation of Wilmington Harbor's sheet pile bulkhead. Continuing deterioration of the bulkhead will contribute to the Harbor's siltation problem. Therefore, the anticipated savings to be gained by not performing this work will have been lost as a result of the additional dredging required to maintain this project's 35' channel; surely a self-defeating effort.

We urge that $500,000 be added to the President's FY '79 Budget and which we understand is the amount that the Corps can effectively use to complete this work.

DELAWARE RIVER DREDGING DISPOSAL STUDY, PA, NJ AND DE

This study was started in Fiscal Year 1978 with an initial appropriation of $75,000. While the President's Budget for Fiscal Year 1979 contains $100,000 for this study, the Philadelphia District has a capability of $125,000.

The purpose of the study is to develop a regional dredging spoil disposal plan for the tidal Delaware River, its tidal tributaries and Delaware Bay including designating specific disposal sites which may be used with minimum degradation of the natural environment.

Obviously, the most essential element and indeed the capstone of the entire port economy rests with the ability to dredge and to dispose of the dredge material. The implications involving this study are too important to tolerate a reduction in relatively minor study costs.

We are told that existing Delaware River spoil disposal sites are now reaching their capacities; some having a remaining life of no more than five years. We therefore urge that an additional $25,000 be appropriated for this most vital study.●

PANAMA DEFECTOR DENOUNCES CANAL TREATIES

HON. LARRY McDONALD

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. McDONALD. Mr. Speaker, many thoughtful Panamanians fear and oppose the proposed treaties. They realize that the treaties are politically unpalatable to most Americans and they also know the passage of both treaties will cement a left-wing dictator in power for the rest of his natural life. Thoughtful Panamanians are appalled at the blackmail exercised by Torrijos. Lieutenant General Graham wrote an astute column on this matter in the Washington Weekly for Thursday, March 16, 1978, based upon his interviews with a Panamanian defector. The column follows:

PANAMANIAN DEFECTOR DENOUNCES CANAL TREATIES

Recently I interviewed Senor Alexis Watson-Castillo, an important former member of the Panamanian dictator Torrijos regime, who had engineered a bold and harrowing escape from Panama. Watson-Castillo and his wife were under threat of death for having refused to participate in the murder of three Panamanians exiled in Costa Rica and alleged cooperation with CIA. This courageous couple brazened their way through Torrijos guards and boarded a jet to the United States with nothing but the clothes on their backs and $20 in their pockets.

Watson-Castillo had held important positions in the Torrijos regime—chief of the Human Resources Department, Budget Accountant, and agent of the dreaded G-2 of the Guardia Nacional. From those positions he was able to observe and report on the viciousness and other corruption of the Torrijos regime. He provided final proof of the involvement of Torrijos in drug traffic, having observed the dictator and his cronies dividing up huge profits from the drug traffic.

He has first-hand knowledge of the rake-offs of Torrijos and the officers of the Guardia Nacional from gambling, prostitution and shakedown of businessmen. He has the details of the murder of the Catholic priest Collegas, who had the audacity to criticize the regime. He knows that the officers of the Guardia have already divided up the land and the houses in the Canal Zone among themselves. His attractive wife testifies to having been striped naked by Torrijos thugs and paraded before drunken guards in a Panamanian jail. She also testifies to seeing Torrijos' prisoners hung from the ceiling by their wrists.

As far the proposed treaties, Watson-Castillo insists they will do the Panamanian people a gross disservice. They will make Torrijos and his gang dictators for life. As a Panamanian, he believes there should be a new treaty with the U.S., but not with such a regime. As he put it, "It is unbelievable to me that a country as large and powerful as the United States could be blackmailed by Torrijos." In his view, the already powerful communist influence in Panama will become total once the treaties are ratified and that Torrijos will arrange for the Soviet Union to replace U.S. subsidies and technicians required to operate the Canal. When this happens, all hope for political freedom in Panama will disappear, and de facto control of the Canal will be in the hands of Castro and the USSR.

Watson-Castillo was very forthright in his testimony and eminently believable. But I did not rely on my subjective judgment in this matter. The entire testimony was monitored by two of this country's leading experts in lie-detection techniques. Senor Watson-Castillo passed the lie-detection tests with flying colors. He speaks the truth.

The testimony of this courageous Panamanian should give pause to those senators who would, by ratifying the Panama Canal Treaties before them, perpetuate the Torrijos regime. If ever there was a chance for the United States to remove a terribly oppressive regime from the backs of a small country, we have it now. If the treaties are not ratified, the Torrijos regime will almost certainly fall of its own rottenness. We could then hope to renegotiate more reasonable treaties with a respectable government of Panama. Since Torrijos states that he would hold elections in August, let us call that bluff and wait until he does before acting on these treaties.●

SALUTE TO JOSEPH TOMLIN

HON. RAYMOND F. LEDERER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. LEDERER. Mr. Speaker, I would like to pause in the business of the House to honor a great American and Philadelphian, Joseph J. Tomlin, Founder-President of Pop Warner Football League.

Joseph was born on October 19, 1902, in Shenandoah, Pennsylvania, moving to Philadelphia with his widowed mother in 1908. In a commitment to neighbors and community rarely seen in today's often transient society, Joe still lives in the same house that his stepfather built in 1908, at 3664 Richmond Street in the Port Richmond section of Philadelphia.

In the year 1929, one of the few good things that came out of the year of the great depression, was the junior football league founded by Joseph Tomlin. This league was renamed the Pop Warner Conference in 1933 when Glen Scobie "Pop" Warner came to Philadelphia to coach the then powerhouse Temple Owls. Warner and Tomlin became close friends; a friendship which helped develop an organization which would help countless youngsters throughout the world.

The Pop Warner Conference has become the largest football program in the United States and is perhaps the first to bring safety concepts of age/weight matching of youngsters to this sport. By 1959, the Pop Warner Conference had become a national headquarters for leagues throughout the country. The name Pop Warner Little Scholars was chosen to put emphasis on scholastic attainment which was always a hallmark of the Local Pop Warner Conference. The program today represents over 6,000 teams in the United States and Mexico, with projects underway to bring youth football to Japan and Saudi Arabia.

Among the many awards Joe Tomlin has received, the one which I am sure he cherishes the most, is the Stagg Award presented in 1955 by the American Football Coaches Association (AFCA). The AFCA is the national organization of all collegiate coaches. This presentation was the first and only time the college coaches presented their most prestigous award to a person who was not a college football coach.

Yet, despite the enormous amount of time which Joe Tomlin has devoted to the Pop Warner Conference, he has still found time to become involved in many other youth programs, including roles a co-founder and director. Among these organizations are Little League Baseball, All American Amateur Baseball Congress and the Sandlot Sports Association. Joe is still on many boards today, both locally and nationally.

On behalf of a justifiably proud city of Philadelphia, and the thousands of kids all over the world who have benefitted from the athletic competition and coaching promoted by the Pop Warner League, the House of Representatives salutes Joseph Tomlin.●

WHERE IS THE NATIONAL COMMISSION ON AIR QUALITY?

HON. ELFORD A. CEDERBERG

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. CEDERBERG. Mr. Speaker, the Clean Air Act Amendments of 1977 became Public Law 95–95 on August 7, 1977, with the signature of the President. Section 323 of this law calls for the establishment of a National Commission on Air Quality.

Congress specifically established this Commission to study alternative methods of carrying out the purposes of the Clean Air Act; and the economic, technological, and environmental consequences of achieving or not achieving them. This Commission is essential for examining whether the levels which the Environmental Protection Agency is seeking represent an appropriate balance among other national goals such as employment and energy efficiency.

This type of commission has a proven, successful track record. In the Federal Water Pollution Control Act Amendments of 1972 (Public Law 92–500), a National Commission on Water Quality was created to undertake a similar study in the area of water quality. Based on the report which this Commission published, important changes were incorporated into the Water Pollution Control Act Amendments of 1977 (Public Law 95–217).

The Air Quality Commission is to be composed of 11 members, including the chairman and ranking minority member of the Senate Committee on Public Works and the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce or their delegates. The seven members of the public are to be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

It is now 9 months since the President signed the Clean Air Act and none of seven public members have been appointed. This is particularly alarming when it is recognized that the law required the Commission to submit its first report to Congress by March 1, 1978.

Because of my concern over the clear lack of action on the part of the President in appointing the public members to this important Commission, I wrote to the President on March 17, 1978, urging his immediate attention to this important duty. I have received a response indicating that tentative selections for the Commission have been made pending necessary clearance and conflict-of-interest procedures.

In light of the critical nature of the work to be done by the National Commission on Air Quality, I hope that an official announcement of the appointment of the seven public members, which for reasons unknown has taken so long, will be made soon.●

CLAYTON FRITCHEY ON SADAT'S HARD LINE

HON. JONATHAN B. BINGHAM

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to see reports from the Middle East which indicate that Israel and Egypt are continuing their direct contacts. It is important that the United States do everything in its power to encourage those contacts without thrusting itself into the midst of the negotiating process.

The administration during the past few weeks has appeared to be openly associating itself with the Egyptian negotiating position in a way that is alarming to friends of Israel in the Congress. There has clearly been pressure on Israel to compromise on key points but no parallel pressure on Egypt. This is despite the fact that President Sadat has refused to submit a counterproposal to Prime Minister Begin's peace proposal and continues to insist that, in return for his visit to Jerusalem, the Israelis accept all the longstanding Egyptian demands. Unfortunately the press has, for the most part, focused on the alleged inflexibility of Prime Minister Begin while ignoring the fact of President Sadat's obduracy.

In Saturday's Washington Post columnist Clayton Fritchey asks that we "pause and check the record" before we all "accept the notion that Egyptian President Sadat is the 'world's foremost peacemaker' while Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin is the opposite." As usual, columnist Fritchey cuts through the prevailing myths and demonstrates just how far they are from the realities of the situation. I hope that Clayton Fritchey's suggestion that we "pause" before we judge Prime Minister Begin is widely heeded.

A PAUSE IN JUDGING BEGIN

Before we all accept the notion that Egyptian President Anwar Sadat is the "world's foremost peacemaker," while Israeli Prime Minister Menachem Begin is the opposite, it might be well to pause and check the record.

If, as now seems improbable, there should be a resumption of the aborted peace talks between Egypt and Israel, it will largely be due to the willingness of a supposedly unbending Begin to send his defense minister to Cairo in the hope of persuading Sadat to negotiate again. Meanwhile, it should be kept in mind that it was Sadat, not Begin, who first broke up the peace negotiations that developed in the wake of the Egyptian leader's trip to Jersusalem and the Israeli leader's return visit to Ismailia.

Sadat, on Jan. 18, abruptly terminated the efforts of a special joint Egyptian-Israeli political committee to negotiate a new compromise agreement. It was a surprise, not only to the world, but even to Sadat's own negotiating team, especially in view of the hopeful progress that the Political Committee had reportedly made.

The reasons for Sadat's peremptorily recalling his representatives from the Jerusalem talks are still in dispute. He simply blamed Israeli "intransigence." In the diplomatic world, however, the more accepted view was—and still is—that the Egyptian president wanted time to soften up Israel by first precipitating American pressure on Begin for more concessions.

It now seems doubtful that Sadat ever took seriously the talks he torpedoed. Four days before the negotiators were to convene. Sadat was saying in Cairo that he had "absolutely no hope" that the joint Political Committee would achieve anything. He also indicated that he was already planning a "different strategy."

That statement was synchronized with personal attacks on Begin in the Cairo press, where he was insultingly referred to as a "Shylock." Sadat likewise became personal, saying, "My initiative for peace is not the King David Hotel, which Begin blew up in his youth."

The scornful reference was to Begin's underground activities in the Irgun resistance forces before Israel's independence. The Irgun blew up a wing of the King David Hotel in Jerusalem, where the British military had its headquarters during the Palestine Mandate.

There was no reason for Sadat to be surprised at the position taken by Israel at the Jan. 18 Political Committee discussions, for the Egyptian leader had been fully advised of Begin's views well before he flew to Jerusalem on Nov. 19 for his now famous appearance before the Israeli Parliament.

When Sadat, last Nov. 8, let it be known that he would be willing to visit Israel, Begin quickly extended him an invitation, but in doing so he said, "Israel categorically and absolutely rejects the conditions named by President Sadat—i.e., total withdrawal to the June 1967 lines and the establishment of a so-called Palestinian state."

Nevertheless, Sadat still chose to go to Jerusalem, but, as can be seen, he went with his eyes open. Likewise, when he later sent his representatives to the joint peace talks, he knew in advance what conditions the Israelis would present.

Moreover, he knew by then that Begin was more flexible than he had been pictured. When the Israeli prime minister went to Ismailia in December to see Sadat, he took with him an offer that had been checked with President Carter, who saw it as a "long step forward" and a "constructive approach."

Although Begin maintains that U.N. Resolution 242 does not require Israel to give up the territory it has occupied since winning the 1967 war, the peace plan he took to Ismailia offered to give back to Egypt nearly all the land it had lost.

As to Judea and Samaria on the West Bank, Begin suggested that for the first time in history the Palestinian Arabs residing in those areas be given self-rule. As Begin said, that has no precedent. And he added:

"For centuries, the Palestinian Arabs were directly ruled by the Turks, then by the British, and then for nearly two decades by the Jordanians in the East and by the Egyptians in the South. It never occurred to either of the two latter ruling Arab regimes to offer autonomy to the Palestinians. It is Israel which suggests self-rule for the first time in the context of an administrative autonomy that will enable the Palestinian Arabs to freely run their daily lives."

All that was made known to Sadat at Ismailia, where, Begin says, he heard "encouraging expressions" from the Egyptian president, who then readily agreed to the establishment of the joint negotiating committee.

"We parted in warm friendship," Begin says, but only a few weeks later, Sadat, with no warning to Begin or anybody else, killed the negotiations and launched his campaign to get the United States to turn the screws on Israel.

Yet, in the face of this, it was Begin who only a few days ago began a new effort to revive the aborted peace talks with Egypt. It is not hard to see why the Israeli prime minister has just won a new vote of confidence from his Cabinet and the Knesset.●

BYELORUSSIAN INDEPENDENCE DAY

HON. JAMES J. BLANCHARD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, March 25 marked the 60th anniversary of the independent Byelorussian National Republic.

Sadly, we note that the independence of the Byelorussian people was short-lived as the Soviet Union reoccupied the territory within a year after the proclamation of independence was signed on March 25, 1918, in Minsk.

The Byelorussian people have fought bravely in attempting to break the shackles of Soviet oppression and regain their freedom. Armed uprisings took place in 1920 and 1922, and Byelorussian independence was very briefly proclaimed again in 1944, before yet another Soviet takeover. Under Soviet occupation the Byelorussians have been deprived of the most basic religious and political freedoms, and have endured harsh persecutions and attempts at russification.

Yet, they are a strong people with a fervent will to succeed in their quest for freedom and a lasting independence. There exists a firm and unceasing conviction that the forces of justice and human rights can win out over Soviet domination and oppression.

In recent years the Soviet Union has attempted to counteract the growing ties between America and the Byelorussian people through the use of propaganda that denigrates life in America, while at the same time stressing totalitarian dogma. We cannot allow such falsehoods to go unchallenged. The voice of freedom must penetrate the barriers of censorship, for only by speaking out can we enable the truth to be heard.

I salute the valiant spirit of the Byelorussian people and pledge my full support for this noble cause. I hope that my colleagues will join with the more than 1 million American citizens of Byelorussian descent in this fight for freedom.●

PRAISE FOR MISSISSIPPI'S VOICE OF DEMOCRACY WINNER

Hon. G. V. (SONNY) MONTGOMERY

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I am extremely pleased and honored to be able to include the remarks of Miss Alicia Mathis, of Stonewall, Miss., who is the State winner of the Voice of Democracy contest. Sponsored by the Veterans of Foreign Wars, the contest plays an important role in helping to make our Nation's young adults more aware of their responsibilities as citizens and the freedoms we enjoy as a democratic country. Miss Mathis is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Horace Mathis and a student at Quitman High School. I urge my colleagues to read Miss Mathis' winning essay and take to heart her admonition that all Americans should be active participants in government.

The essay follows:

1977–78 V.F.W. VOICE OF DEMOCRACY SCHOLARSHIP PROGRAM

Birds flying through the air unhindered, a stream running swiftly down a mountain pass, dusk quietly falling, peace . . ., the epitome of America! This picture is in violent contrast to what a country could be, and what many countries are. Instead of the freedom of the birds, citizens are forced to be under constant surveillance. The quiet of the evening is continuously rent by the deafening roar of exploding artillery. In opposition to velvety green meadows is the blood red stains of the battlefields. And yet, many people ask, "Do I have a responsibility to America?"

My responsibility is deeply rooted in America's past. The first colonists in this country laid the foundation for America's democratic form of government. The patriots of the American Revolution built on that foundation, using blood as mortar and determination as bricks. Decades later, the union they had fought so hard to obtain was threatened by civil war. But, one hundred years had not killed the patriotism burning within many Americans. With more blood and more tears our free form of government was reinforced to stand taller and firmer than ever. Although peace reigned on American soil for many years, democracy was threatened across the ocean many times. Each time, Americans heard the cry for freedom, and fought and died so that an overseas threat could never harm their beloved homeland.

To these people who gave their time, their hopes, their prayers, their lives, I owe a great debt. I am obligated to uphold American democracy with the same fervency that past citizens have done. They must not have died in vain!

The preamble to the Constitution of the United States says that the document was written "... in order ... to secure the blessings of liberty ... to our posterity ..." I feel that I owe my children the same free environment as the one in which I have lived.

Future citizens of the world should have the opportunity to experience living at its fullest, which can only be enjoyed in a democratic society.

Also, I have a very grave responsibility to myself to preserve the liberty that is mine today. America should remain a strong, steadfast, and God-fearing nation. Otherwise, her decrease in strength and power will cause me to lose the liberty that is so important to me. Apathy and indifference must not take control of America. It is my duty to see that such a state of affairs never exists. One way of accomplishing this is to always maintain an active interest in the government. Voting is the most obvious way of exercising my political rights. But also, as an informed citizen I can contribute to the running of America by voicing my opinion. Freedom of speech and press gives unlimited opportunity for my letting the world know what I think. Because America is a representative form of government, it is important that I tell the elected officials my views on issues. I am a part of the people being represented. It is not enough to have a democracy. Each individual must use the voice he has been given. It is my responsibility to see that my voice does not remain idle, but speaks out for justice and freedom. In that way, my obligations to my country will be filled, and America will not be just a large piece of land, but a part of myself.●

U.N. SECURITY COUNCIL REPROACHED FOR UNFAIRNESS TO BISHOP MUZOREWA

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, I have been a long time supporter of the United Nations. I have defended it on many occasions.

The United Nations provides a responsible and civil atmosphere in which all the nations of the world—with all their varing ideologies—can air their disagreements and debate the overriding global issues.

However, I am appalled at the recent actions of the U.N. Security Council with respect to Bishop Abel Muzorewa of Rhodesia—soon to be Zimbabwe.

When the council shut its door to Bishop Muzorewa, it shut its door to a legitimate spokesman and leader of his nations. And, the Security Council, by its unexpected actions, rejected the concept of freedom of speech which has been a foundation block of the United Nations.

No matter what his political philosophy, no matter what his ideology or motivations, Bishop Muzorewa should have been extended the opportunity to present his case before the Security Council.

I bring to the attention of my colleagues the following editorial which appeared in the Christian Science Monitor of March 13, 1978:

MUZZLING MUZOREWA

"Deplorable," said America's UN Ambassador Andrew Young. "Thoroughly regrettable and totally wrong," said Britain's UN Ambassador Ivor Richard. We could not agree more with such condemnations of shutting the Security Council door to Bishop Abel Muzorewa of Rhodesia.

As one of three black leaders who signed a majority-rule agreement with Prime Minister Ian Smith, the Bishop wanted to present his case as opponents of the agreement have been permitted to do. It defied all the rules of fair discussion for him to be blocked by the prospect of a majority of the council giving in to the demands of Africans who denounce the agreement as a fraud.

It may turn out to be a fraud, a risk Bishop Muzorewa and his colleagues are taking by going it alone with the Smith regime. Certainly the agreement's political provisions based solely on race are contrary to United Nations principles. And in practical terms any transition to majority rule would be difficult without the participation of the Patriotic Front guerrilla leaders, Joshua Nkomo and Robert Mugabe. Their pressures contributed to Mr. Smith's belated move, and they are supported by the front-line African nations neighboring Rhodesia.

But the agreement is a major step forward in Rhodesia's internal politics. The way to build on it or replace it by something such as the long-pending Anglo-American plan is not to suppress discussion but to encourage it. Indeed, the African opponents who term the agreement a black sell-out to Prime Minister Smith only make themselves look fanatical and undependable by such tactics as denying Bishop Muzorewa the UN forum given to Messrs. Nkomo and Mugabe. If they clamp down on free speech even at the UN what confidence do they inspire about preserving free speech should they come to power in Rhodesia?

Not much. The longer the opponents of the agreement behave in this matter the better the supporters of the agreement will look.●

BOY'S TOWNS OF ITALY TO HONOR YOUNGSTOWN, OHIO, MAYOR PHILLIP RICHLEY AT BENEFIT DINNER

HON. CHARLES J. CARNEY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. CARNEY. Mr. Speaker, on Sunday, May 7, 1978, a dinner and dance will be held for the benefit of the Boy's Towns of Italy at Powers Auditorium Grand Lobby in Youngstown, Ohio. Over 2,400 Youngstown area residents of all religious faiths are expected to attend.

Mayor J. Phillip Richley of Youngstown will be the honored guest at the event, and he will receive a special award from the founder of Boy's Towns of Italy for his outstanding work and contributions to the organization.

Presenting the award will be Msgr. John Patrick Carroll-Abbing, the remarkable Irish priest who founded Boy's Towns of Italy over 30 years ago.

Patterned after the American Boys Town, Msgr. Carroll's initial emergency program in 1944 assisted more than 200,000 destitute children in war-torn Italy. With the aid of contributions from Americans and Italians of all religious faiths, Boy's Towns of Italy has grown to include 40 day schools, a Girl's Town, and 9 Boy's Towns, all of which provide scholastic and vocational training to needy Italian children.

The boys at the Boy's Towns of Italy exercise self-government—with secret ballot elections for their own mayors, finance, public works, sanitation, and education commissioners. In addition, residents earn their own way by performing after-school chores in exchange for Boy's Town currency. The Boy's Town economic system teaches the boys responsibility by allowing them to purchase food, clothing, and supplies from their own stores, and to save at their own banks. A graduate of Boy's Town of Italy is a responsible, productive, well-trained, and well-educated member of society.

Statesmen and journalists have long praised the Boy's Towns of Italy. The late President Kennedy said:

From its modest beginning, this movement has, in a relatively short time, become a truly realized ideal and a model for those in the world who would endow a coming generation with hope and courage.

Clearly, the Boy's Towns of Italy program will pay dividends in good citizenship for generations to come. As one who will be present at the upcoming dinner and dance in Youngstown, I believe that everyone associated with this enterprise deserves the commendation and support of each of us.●

THE 60TH ANNIVERSARY OF BYELORUSSIAN INDEPENDENCE

HON. JOSEPH G. MINISH

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. MINISH. Mr. Speaker, during the Easter district work period, the 60th anniversary of Byelorussian independence was marked. I am pleased at this time to pay tribute to the brave and freedom-loving people of Byelorussia.

During the late 19th and early 20th centuries a distinct Byelorussian culture asserted itself within czarist Russia. Despite strong opposition and constant harassment by the central government, books and newspapers were published in the Byelorussian language, a Byelorussian theater was established and a Byelorussian political party took shape.

World War I provided the Byelorussians with the opportunity to establish their national independence. Shortly after the Russian March Revolution of 1917, a congress of the Byelorussian Socialist Hromada was called in Minsk, Byelorussia's major city. The Congress called for the reorganization of Russia as a federative state with Byelorussia enjoying autonomous status. Soon after, a democratically elected congress of delegates adopted a resolution endorsing the right of self-determination for all people.

Before the congress adjourned, however, the Bolsheviks, who had seized power in Russia in November 1917, surrounded the building where the meeting was being held and disbanded the congress with a display of armed power. By this action, Byelorussia became one of the very first victims of Communist aggression.

More favorable conditions prevailed when the Germans occupied Byelorussia after February 1918. On March 25, 1918, the Rada of the Byelorussian National Republic solemnly declared their independence and published an official decree to that effect.

Despite great difficulties imposed by the war and its consequences, the Byelorussian Government made significant advances in the fields of education, culture and social welfare. The new government was also active internationally, and sought and received recognition from numerous countries.

Byelorussian independence, sadly, was short-lived. On December 10, 1918, the Communists seized Minsk and set up a puppet government. With the Treaty of Riga in 1921, Byelorussia was divided between Poland and the Soviet Union.

Mr. Speaker, to this day the Byelorussian people have not been subdued by their Communist overlords. Tactics of deportation, executions, purges and terrorism have failed to dampen their belief in freedom and self-determination. I salute the brave Byelorussian people and pray that their goal of national liberation is soon realized.●

WATERWAY USER FEES

HON. DOUGLAS WALGREN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. WALGREN. Mr. Speaker, I received recently a copy of Pennsylvania House Resolution Number 118 which was adopted by the Pennsylvania House of Representatives on July 12, 1977, and by the Senate on March 6, 1978.

This resolution expresses the opposition of the Pennsylvania General Assembly to the passage of an inland waterway user fee and the linking of the authorization of locks and dam 26 to the passage of the inland waterway fee.

I commend this resolution to my colleagues for their consideration.

HOUSE RESOLUTION No. 118

In the House of Representatives, June 15, 1977.

Whereas, The Congress of the United States has before it Senate Bill 790 which, if enacted in its present form, would mandate an inland waterways user fee in addition to providing for the replacement of a certain dam and locks; and

Whereas, Such user fee is in reality a tax upon the use of inland waterways, the imposition of which would raise the cost of water transportation; and

Whereas, Inland waterways provide the most energy efficient means of transportation; and

Whereas, The United States Department of Transportation reports that in terms of ton miles carried per gallon of fuel oil or gasoline consumed, a gallon will move 300 ton-miles by water, but only 180 ton-miles by rail and 50 ton-miles by truck; and

Whereas, Every ton taken off the river will end up in either a train or a truck thus increasing the Nation's energy consumption; and

Whereas, Inland waterway transportation causes less air and noise pollution as well as having the best safety record; and

Whereas, The iron, steel and other industries in the Pittsburgh and western Pennsylvania area are dependent to a great extent on efficient water transportation; and

Whereas, The increased cost of the transportation of fuels, raw materials and finished products resulting from the imposition of this tax would have a deleterious effect upon the industry of western Pennsylvania; and

Whereas, The joining of legislation dealing with a specific project authorization, with an issue involving a major policy consideration with substantial economic impact is ill advised, the two issues should be separated and each decided strictly on its own merits; therefore be it

Resolved (the Senate concurring), That the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania memoralize the Congress of the United States to divide the specific project authorization from the waterways user fee proposal currently joined in Senate Bill 790, and to let each issue be divided separately as its own merits; and be it further

Resolved (the Senate concurring), that the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania memoralize the President and Congress of the United States that the members of this general assembly oppose the inland waterways user fee as proposed in Senate Bill No. 790; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of this resolution be transmitted to the President of the United States, to the presiding officers of each house of the Congress of the United States and to each senator and representative from Pennsylvania in the Congress of the United States.●

GAO DOCUMENTS NEED TO IMPROVE HEALTH AND SOCIAL SERVICE PROGRAMS

HON. WILLIAM S. COHEN

OF MAINE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. COHEN. Mr. Speaker, just prior to the Easter recess, the General Accounting Office released a report entitled, "Information and Referral for People Needing Human Services—A Complex System That Should Be Improved."

The report highlights the need to develop ways to consolidate existing information and referral services to health and social service programs and to promote the establishment of comprehensive information and referral centers. The report characterizes our existing $100 billion service delivery system as one whose effectiveness and efficiency is lost in the duplication and fragmentation of and competition between services and functions, which wastes resources and contributes to the high cost and inadequacy of existing services. For example, more than a dozen programs, including medicare, medicaid, title XX social services and the Older Americans Act, provide long-term medical or supportive services. Each of these programs has a different set of eligibility requirements and income limits, and often they are governed by conflicting regulations. No wonder needy citizens are frustrated in their efforts to avail themselves of their entitlements.

This report is one of 11 released within the last 13 months which attests to the need for a program of multidisciplinary assessment and case management. As a member of the House Select Committee on Aging, I am particularly concerned as to how this state of affairs effects the elderly. Certainly, older people should have their health and social needs assessed and, when necessary, have appropriate services delivered, monitored, and evaluated.

Acting on this wealth of information, Congressman PEPPER and I introduced legislation, H.R. 11410, authorizing a grant program for States to establish within communities "single entry point" programs of assessment and referral for the entire range of medical and social services needed by the Nation's chronically ill and disabled elderly. We have been joined by 42 other Members of Congress, namely:

Mr. ANDERSON of California, Mr. BLOUIN, Mr. CARNEY, Mr. HANNAFORD, Ms. HOLTZMAN, Mr. HYDE, Mr. LA FALCE, Mr. MITCHELL of Maryland, Mr. MOAKLEY, Mr. MOORHEAD of Pennsylvania, Mr. PRICE, Mr. RODINO, Mr. WEAVER, Mr. YOUNG of Missouri, Mr. BEARD of Tennessee, Mr. SOLARZ, Mr. GUYER, Mr. PANETTA, Mr. BIAGGI, Mr. CLAY, Mr. GOODLING, Mr. JEFFORDS, Mr. ZEFERETTI, Mr. MURPHY of Pennsylvania, Mr. SARASIN, Mr. SIMON, Mr. DOWNEY, Mr. DRINAN, Mr. HAMMERSCHMIDT, Mr. HUGHES, Ms. OAKAR, Mr. WAXMAN, Mr. AKAKA, Mr. BINGHAM, Mr. DIGGS, Mr. DUNCAN of Tennessee, Mr. EDGAR, Mr. EILBERG, Mr. FASCELL, Mr. FRASER, Mr. ROYBAL, and Mrs. SPELLMAN.

This legislation has as its goal a system of health and social service delivery which matches people with services—the kinds of services they need when they need them. Central to the success of our legislation is the willingness of the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare to encourage and facilitate the use of waivers and other financial mechanisms between categorical programs in order for localities to pool resources in the most advantageous manner. The GAO reports states that "the Secretary should play a prominent role in this effort."

I have taken the liberty of including a digest of the GAO report with my remarks for the benefit of my colleagues. I recommend that they take the time to read the report in full.

The GAO report follows:

COMPTROLLER GENERAL'S REPORT—TO THE CONGRESS

There is a vast, complex system of human services in the United States to meet individuals' needs. Many programs designed to reduce the dependency and increase the self-sufficiency of people throughout the Nation are supported by Federal, State, and local governments and by private organizations. The Federal Government spends over $100 billion annually to provide for services in areas such as health, rehabilitation, employment, income maintenance, nutrition, and education. (See ch. 1.)

Many agencies provide information and referral support to help people link up with these human service systems. Unfortunately, those who provide information and referral services have, themselves, become part of the maze to which they were supposed to offer guidance. This orderless growth has resulted in a specialized, fragmented system characterized by:

Duplication of and competition between services and functions;

Waste of resources;

Barriers obstructing access; and Inadequate services.

As a result, people can be shuffled from agency to agency, and many either will not receive the services needed or will receive them only after great or exasperating difficulty. (See ch. 2.)

Many Federal agencies spend hundreds of millions of dollars collectively each year to support community information and referral services. Over half the total expenditures by 143 of these providers contacted by GAO were from various Federal agencies.

These agencies pay for many fragmented and competing providers within individual communities. Furthermore, most of them do not prescribe quality standards to help maintain at least minimum levels of acceptable services, with the result that Federal agencies contribute to the problems. A coordinated Federal program to deliver information and referral efficiently and effectively does not exist. (See ch. 3.)

Most Federal and local officials reached by GAO believe that consolidating activities into comprehensive centers, rather than specializing in certain classifications, will help eliminate fragmentation and improve the quality of their services. Comprehensive centers could serve all people and refer them to all types of services. But consolidating information and referral activities into such centers has been hindered by a lack of coordination and Federal leadership. (See ch. 4.)

Many agencies providing information and referral services are reluctant or unwilling to relinquish their activities and cooperate to pool resources. Centers established to consolidate activities and provide comprehensive services have found themselves competing with other providers for clientele and appropriations.

Not only is this cooperation lacking, but Federal agencies have not coordinated or consolidated their activities to avoid fragmentation, duplication, and inadequate services.

Many of the community providers receive financial support from various Federal agencies, but their local officials lack the authority and direction to consolidate activities. Many local officials believe that the coordinated policy must be developed federally before improvements can be achieved locally. Meanwhile, the lack of a single Federal focal point with the responsibility and authority for coordinating Federal programs for community-based information and referral services continues, and no action has been taken to develop such a national policy and plan.

Without assigned responsibility to do so, Federal agencies are unlikely to coordinate information and referral programs and consolidate funds and activities. (See ch. 5.)

The Director, Office of Management and Budget, in consultation with the Secretary of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare (HEW) and the heads of other Federal agencies funding information and referral activities, should establish a task force to develop, for consideration by the Congress, a national policy and plan requiring coordination between agencies to consolidate such activities and promote the establishment of comprehensive centers. The Secretary of HEW should play a prominent role in this effort.

The policy and plan should cover:

—actions required to eliminate duplication of information and referral services among Federal agencies,

—ways in which Federal resources can be redirected and pooled with State, local, and private resources to form and operate comprehensive information and referral centers,

—strategies that the Office of Management and Budget should use to elicit the cooperation of Federal, State, local, and private organizations in emplementing the plan, and —evaluation of whether there are better alternatives to comprehensive centers and whether they are more cost effective.

The Community Services Administration; the General Services Administration; United Way of America; and the Departments of Agriculture, Housing and Urban Development, and Labor agreed with GAO's findings.

The Veterans Administration expressed concern that comprehensive centers might not be feasible or cost effective.

The Office of Management and Budget favors doing a study of the entire human service delivery system and believes information and referral services can be considered as part of that study rather than singly.

GAO believes that information and referral services constitute an entry point to the human service delivery system and would provide a logical starting point for improvement of the entire system.

HEW endorsed the general concept of comprehensive information and referral services. It did express concern about the cost effectiveness of comprehensive information and referral compared to existing centers and suggested a formal mechanism to assure State and local participation. (See ch. 6.)

BROWN LUNG DISEASE ACT OF 1978

HON. BUTLER DERRICK

OF SOUTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. DERRICK. Mr. Speaker, I am introducing today the Brown Lung Disease Act of 1978.

There are more than 800,000 Americans involved in the processing of cotton fiber, and every one of these workers daily faces the threat of brown lung disease. At least 35,000 workers are estimated to be suffering from byssinosis, or brown lung disease.

A shortness of breath, a tightness in the chest, and decreased lung function are caused by brown lung. The dust involved with all operations of the cotton industry can affect workers adversely after only a year and can cause disabling effects within 7 years. This is permanent damage which no drug or treatment can reverse.

Brown lung has been recognized as a danger since the early 18 century, when Bernardino Ramazzinni noted a hacking cough among flax and hemp workers. The problem was traced to cotton dust, which still today permeates the atmosphere around workers in the cotton industry.

Brown lung is a specific chronic respiratory disorder that results from the action of cotton dust on the respiratory passages. Its effects can lead to chronic obstructive lung disease, with the employee losing up to 75 percent of his or her breathing capacity. The disease also kills.

My bill would provide benefits to active and retired workers who are totally disabled due to byssinosis. Benefits would also be available to dependents of workers who were totally disabled by the disease at the time of their death.

Under my proposal, compensation rates would be set at $219.80 a month for a worker with no dependents, $329.80 with one dependent, $384.80 with two dependents, and $439.80 with three or more dependents.

The Federal Government would make payments to workers who retire before January 1, 1979, and the owner who employed the brown lung victim would be responsible for those that retire after January 1, 1979.

The bill specifies that the authority to make payments expires after September 30, 1983, at which time the Congress would review the program based on information provided by the Secretary of Labor. This "sunset" provision is in keeping with the Legislative Oversight Act of 1978 which I introduced earlier this session and will assure that the program is held responsible to the taxpayers.

Furthermore, the Secretary of Labor would have to present on October 15 of each year a report advising the Congress as to whether or not the goals and planned accomplishments of the program (as spelled out in the bill) are being met. This report would have to be written in specific, quantifiable terms and include information on costs and the number of people screened, identified, and compensated for byssinosis.

I believe we can pass this important brown lung bill during this session of the 95th Congress and, by doing so, demonstrate to our constituents, especially those that work in the cotton industry, that we are concerned about their health and well-being.●

FIX THE TRACKS

HON. JOHN L. BURTON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, the wave of recent freight train derailments which killed 22 people in Tennessee and Florida has once again underscored the deteriorated condition of this country's railroad tracks. They are both a national disgrace and a threat to human lives.

Although the shipment of dangerous or explosive substances in large rail tank cars compounds the threat presented by deteriorated railbeds and crowded rail corridors, the majority of the problems can still be traced to overall track conditions.

Federal reports show that in 1976 there were close to 8,000 train derailments and about one a day involved some shipment of hazardous substances. One of the causes for these accidents is the deteriorating track. While the railroads have been putting money into track repairs, much more is needed.

The San Francisco Sunday Examiner and Chronicle recently ran their idea in an editorial suggesting that some funds should be pared out of the defense budget and spent on railroad tracks and roadbeds. I think that the editors have an idea which merits the attention of my colleagues in Congress and I would like to submit their March 12 editorial here:

[From the San Francisco Sunday Examiner and Chronicle, Mar. 12, 1978]

FIX THE TRACKS

The neglect of railroad tracks in the United States is a national disgrace. During the last year, there were almost 8,000 derailed train accidents and 500 of those wrecks involved tank cars carrying dangerous chemicals. In the space of a few recent days, track-jumping crashes killed 20 persons and spewed lethal gases over nearby communities.

Some 200,000 miles of track are in service. Of these, more than 44,000 miles are under "go slow" orders because of poor track conditions. For example, Amtrak Metroliner express trains run at only about half speed between New York and Washington because of the deteriorated railbeds in that busy corridor.

Airlines and trucking companies have eaten up the freight and passenger-carrying business but railroads still play an important role in commerce and national defense.

The Carter administration should take about $15 billion out of the defense budget—where such a relatively small sum would hardly be missed—and spend it on tracks and roadbeds. Along with protecting a great national asset, the project would provide jobs for an estimated 100,000 unemployed, including thousands of youths who can't find work in private industry.●

LABOR GROUPS JOIN CONSUMERS IN SUPPORT OF FAMILY FARMERS

HON. FREDERICK W. RICHMOND

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. RICHMOND. Mr. Speaker, the financial difficulties faced today by America's family farmers affect all segments of our economy. They reach all the way to urban consumers, who bear the brunt of high food prices even though farmers are not making a profit and in many cases are losing money.

As the only urban member of the House Agriculture Committee, I have long advocated that consumers and farmers join together to end this economic injustice. I am pleased to note that the AFL–CIO Executive Council, representing many of our Nation's labor unions, is also concerned about the plight of the family farmer.

I would like to share with my colleagues a recent statement by the AFL–CIO Executive Council expressing their support of efforts by Congress to solve the farm crisis. I hope my urban colleagues will remember this vital support by the AFL–CIO as we vote on many critical bills affecting both our rural and urban areas this coming year.

The statement follows:

SUPPORT FOR FAMILY FARMERS

The plight of America's family farmers is more serious today than at any time since the dust bowl, but the crisis today is man-made, not a natural disaster. The growth of corporate farming, insufficient regulation of commodity speculators and international grain traders, and high interest rates have created a blight for farmers far worse than any nature could apply.

At the same time, right-wing and corporate interests, working through the ultra-conservative, big business-oriented Farm Bureau Federation, have launched a propaganda attack against the labor movement designed to alienate family farmers from their traditional allies. Throughout American political history, alliances between workers and family farmers have forged progressive social and economic programs to benefit average Americans. The traditional bond between workers and family farmers must not be allowed to be severed by cheap political propaganda.

The new movement in rural America, American Agricultural Movement—like the cooperative movement before it and the long-standing, progressive family farm organizations—deserves the support and assistance of the labor movement. The AAM has called a farm strike as a last resort, in the same way that union workers are sometimes forced to strike. The AAM sees no other way to achieve quick government action to assist family farmers. Family farmers are threatened by corporate and foreign takeover of farm land, which would also leave consumers at the mercy of corporate monopolies and absentee landowners.

Obviously the farm strike is a legitimate exercise of their right as Americans to withhold their labor when conditions are unfair. Just as we believe that workers are entitled to a fair wage for their labors, we believe farmers are entitled to a fair return for their labors.

Therefore, the AFL–CIO pledges to work with labor's traditional allies in the farm community in the pursuit of that goal. We urge the Congress and the Administration to seek speedy, effective solutions to the crisis in American agriculture tailored to meet the needs of the family farmer but denied to corporate farmers and to commodity speculators. Finally, we urge our state central bodies to continue to work with the family farm organizations in their state in pursuit of mutual goals.●

NATION'S MAJOR MEDIA EXHIBITING SUICIDAL TENDENCIES

HON. GEORGE HANSEN

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. HANSEN. Mr. Speaker, freedom of speech and of the press is guaranteed under the first amendment of the Constitution and has weathered many assaults from those who would restrict the latitude of the fourth estate. However, nothing in the Constitution can save the press from itself and its current self-imposed suicidal tendencies toward news management and manipulation.

As the Nation's media has centralized into large chain operations owned by international corporate structures, it is rapidly losing its independence and individualism and the communities of the Nation are being welded together by the great brainwashing devils available to the major media readily influenced by boards of directors which interlace with the executive structure of the Nation's multinational corporations and international unions.

Never was such a management and censorship operation so evident in this Nation as in the current controversy over the Panama Canal treaties. The multinational economic interests of the United States are unified for their own financial purposes behind approval of the treaties, and they have exerted enough muscle on officials of Government that it is very possible they will get their way despite the overwhelming resistance of grassroots America.

The best example of this interlacing of corporate directors is one of the treaty negotiators himself, Sol Linowitz, who at the time of his appointment was a member of the boards of Marine Midland Bank, Pan American Airways, and Time magazine. To illustrate how this management and censorship is working, I submit the following excellent commentary dated for release April 8, 1978, by Mr. Reed Irvine, chairman of the board of Accuracy in Media, a news monitoring organization based in Washington, D.C.

The commentary follows:

PRESS IGNORES POLL OF HOUSE ON PANAMA CANAL

WASHINGTON.—I have pointed out in this space before that over half of the members of the House of Representatives have signed a resolution calling for a vote in the House on the disposition of the Panama Canal Zone and the U.S. property located there. The House has no constitutional right to vote on treaties, but Article IV of the Constitution states: "The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States."

In the past, when territory that was originally included in the Canal Zone has been turned over to Panama, approval of the House of Representatives has been sought in nearly every case. These transfers involved property that was insignificant compared to what is now being proposed—giving the entire Canal Zone and nearly everything in it to Panama.

The Constitution and past precedents would seem to indicate quite clearly that this is the kind of action that both houses of Congress should vote on. However, the leadership of the House has not even permitted the resolution calling for such a vote to come to the floor, even though it has now been signed by well over half of the members.

Rep. George Hansen of Idaho, who has been the guiding spirit behind the effort to obtain for the House of Representatives its right to have a voice in this very important property transfer, has said that the signers of the resolution would not all vote against turning the Canal Zone over to Panama.

However, Lee Roderick, the enterprising Washington correspondent of the Scripps League Newspapers, decided to find out how the House would vote if it were given a chance to do so. Roderick had his staff query all of the 435 representatives. They found that 170 said they would vote against transferring the property to Panama, and another 38 said they were inclined to vote against such a transfer. Only 102 said they would vote for the transfer, with an additional thirty saying they were leaning in that direction. Seventy representatives said that they were uncommitted, and 25 declined to comment.

Since it would take only 218 votes in the House to kill the proposed transfer, it is clear from this tally that there is a very strong possibility that a bill to effect the proposed grant of U.S. property to Panama would not make it through the House of Representatives. This no doubt explains why the Administration and the House leadership are unwilling to heed the expressed will of a majority of the Congressman that such a bill be submitted for a vote.

Are the watchdogs of the news media up in arms about this flouting of the Constitution and democratic principles?

We pointed out in an earlier column that the fact that more than a majority of the Congressmen have signed the resolution asking for a House vote has been pretty generally ignored by the press. The New York Times did report on March 3 that the number of Congressmen backing this resolution was up to 227, but this was the only mention of this that we have seen in any of the major media. This story noted that not all of the co-sponsors of the resolution would vote against the transfer.

However, when the Scripps League tally of how the House would vote was released a week later, The New York Times was one of many, many papers that ignored the story. The story was carried on the wires of United Press International on March 10. I checked over twenty newspapers and could find only one that printed the information that Lee Roderick had so painstakingly compiled. That was the Des Moines Register.

This is the kind of behavior on the part of the news media that causes leaders of the anti-treaty forces such as Senator Griffin of Michigan to charge that the pro-treaty leanings of the news media have resulted in biased coverage of this great debate.●

AN EXAMINATION OF THE U.S. SALT POSTURE

HON. JACK F. KEMP

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. KEMP. Mr. Speaker, the United States is far advanced in its attempts to negotiate a second sound SALT agreement to replace the 1972 accords (SALT I) which expired in October of last year. As a consequence, most of the important contours of the proposed agreement are known and are in the public domain. One of the thorough and technically competent reviews of the U.S. SALT proposals has been produced by Mr. Edgar Ulsamer, senior editor of Air Force Magazine, in its January 1978 issue.

Mr. Ulsamer's essay, "The Equal Sign in the SALT II Equation," cites the aspects of the proposed agreement which undermine the basis for congressional support of the negotiations; namely, the manifest inequality—with the United States left with numerically inferior forces—of the agreement. The terms of the proposed treaty are so one-sided that, as Mr. Ulsamer clearly explicates, that the U.S. ICBM force will be vulnerable to unacceptable attrition by the early to mid-1980's. Other crucial weaknesses in the present form of the proposed agreement dealing with cruise missiles, technology transfer limitations to NATO, and the lack of verifiability provide a compelling case for congressional rejection of the agreement in its present form. I have included the text of Mr. Ulsamer's essay at the conclusion of my remarks:

THE EQUAL SIGN IN THE SALT II EQUATION

(By Edgar Ulsamer)

When Secretary of State Cyrus Vance last fall briefed a select group of U.S. senators on the status of SALT II, Sen. Henry (Scoop) Jackson (D-Wash.) reportedly reacted with undisguised irritation and frustration. Senator Jackson, a forceful, apperceptive critic of negotiating errors that in earlier rounds of the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks led to loopholes and asymmetries, putatively bristled at the apparent absence of coherent

U.S. policy approaches and at the concessions—not briefed to the appropriate Senate subcommittee—that occurred after the Carter Administration first went to the mat with Moscow's SALT II negotiators early in 1977.

At this writing, the bottom line on SALT II is still hazy but most of the pivotal features of this pending accord that will vitally influence the strategic posture of the two superpowers in the next decade and beyond, are becoming discernible. Capitol Hill SALT watchers guardedly predict that the agreement will be concluded before May 1978.

The proposed SALT terms are being aired publicly—to the obvious chagrin of the Administration—through volleys of news leaks and counterleaks. Gag orders, concerning direct discussion of SALT-related matters with Congress, issued to the Defense Department and other government agencies, have slowed but not shut off the leaks.

Rep. Robin Beard (R-Tenn.), a member of the House Armed Services Committee and Chairman of the House Republican Task Force on National Defense, charged the Carter Administration with attempting to suppress independent and critical assessments of the Administration's SALT II proposals. Beard released the text of an Administration memorandum, signed by David Aaron, Deputy Assistant to the President for National Security Affairs, to the Departments of State and Defense as well as the Arms Control and Disarmament Agency, the Central Intelligence Agency, and the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff. This White House order requested that any information to be provided to Congress on the strategic forces and programs of the U.S. and U.S.S.R. "should be cleared through the SALT Working Group" to assure that such analyses are "consistent with and represent the best judgment of the Executive Branch." The underlying objective, according to Beard, is "to stifle independent and objective assessments of the . . . SALT II proposal and prevent Congress from gaining access to any dissenting viewpoints."

At the same time, five Senators considered proponents of the Carter Administration's SALT approach launched a counteroffensive to change the makeup of the Senate's Arms Control Subcommittee. Sen. Gary Hart (D-Colo.) even called a special news conference to denounce unnamed malefactors "who oppose a SALT II treaty agreement—and possibly any realistic arms limitation treaty [and who] have rushed to judgment, to reveal and condemn the treaty still being fashioned."

Meanwhile, congressional sources report increasing Administration pressure via the "pork barrel sector" on members suspected of fostering opposition to the present terms of SALT II. White House concern is understandable; at least the core element of SALT II—the basic treaty that is to be in effect for eight years—requires Senate approval by a two-thirds majority. At this writing, opponents of the SALT II terms claim their informal polling suggests that "at least between thirty-five and forty nay votes" can be expected. It would take only thirty-four nays to reject such an accord.

Press coverage of SALT's terms, in spite of extensive public relations campaigns by the White House and other government departments concerned with SALT, has often been critical. Typical of the reaction among newspapers of generally conservative persuasion was this lead of a Chicago Tribune commentary: "The best thing that can be said about the proposed SALT agreement slowly emerging in Geneva is that it tilts so outrageously in favor of the Soviet Union as virtually to defy the Senate to ratify it." The fact that congressional action on the Panama Canal treaties, another cliff hanger, could well overlap with Senate action on SALT II, provides little comfort to the supporters of the latter. Two other Carter Administration initiatives in the disarmament field also might affect the congressional climate at the time: the so-called Comprehensive Test Ban Treaty (CTB) eliminating all nuclear testing—considered by most technical experts as essentially unverifiable—and a ban equally difficult to monitor and enforce on the test, development, and deployment of chemical warfare weapons.

Whether these basically adverse political factors—coupled with reportedly increasing Soviet recalcitrance concerning certain unresolved or "gray" issues—will cause the Administration to toughen its stance is problematical. What seems certain is that SALT II will undergo further, drawn-out modification. The case for revision—despite obvious U.S. eagerness to fill the vacuum brought about when the SALT I five-year interim accord expired last October—becomes formidable through such public statements as Rep. Jack Kemp's (R.-N.Y.) comment that "I am appalled at the extent of the collapse of our SALT negotiating posture. We are headed for an agreement which will increase the risk of nuclear war and codify Soviet strategic nuclear superiority with the unmeasurable consequences for our diplomacy such a condition implies. . . . The Congress will not ratify such a one-sided agreement, and I will make every effort to see that SALT II is not ratified until its terms are modified to provide for equality for the United States."

Perhaps even more significant was a recent letter to President Carter by three Democratic senators—all members of the Armed Services Committee and considered staunch supporters of strategic arms limitations. Sens. Thomas J. McIntyre (D-N.H.), John C. Culver (D-Iowa), and Dale Bumpers (D-Ark.), importuned the White House to take a stiffer stance and insist on more precise SALT II language to protect vital U.S. interests. The letter listed six specific treaty areas in need of shoring up "to strengthen the agreement and to broaden support for ratification."

THE SALT II OUTLINE

Possibly the most telling blow was struck by Paul Nitze, a former SALT negotiator and a Deputy Secretary of Defense in the Johnson Administration. The picture of SALT II's consequences drawn by Mr. Nitze for the news media—subsequently confirmed in terms of broad facts but not in implication by a senior defense official—is that "in prompt countermilitary potential residing in ICBMs the present approximate state of parity will degrade to a better than ten-to-one advantage for the Soviet Union by 1985; that by that year the Soviets will have achieved numerical parity with the U.S. in warheads; that by 1985 the Soviet lead in total megatonnage over the U.S. will be slightly more than six to one"; and that recent U.S. program decisions plus the terms of the probable SALT agreement make it virtually impossible "to maintain crisis stability, rough equivalence, or to reverse the presently unfavorable trends during the period of the agreements. . . . We are," said Mr. Nitze, "locked into inferiority and I don't know how to get out of it."

SALT II, as presently structured, is to consist of a treaty, a Protocol, and a Statement of Principles that spells out the major issues to be dealt with in SALT III.

The actual treaty, Mr. Nitze and several congressmen, including Representatives Beard and Kemp, told the press, likely to become retroactive to the expiration of the SALT I Interim Agreement last fall and, initially, is to limit both sides to an aggregate of 2,400 strategic nuclear launch vehicles (SNVLs) consisting of ICBM and SLBM launchers and heavy bombers. This limit was arrived at in the 1974 Vladivostok understanding. The initially authorized total is to be reduced to an extent and over a period of time that are still not firmly decided. The US proposed a reduction to about 2,160 by 1980 while the Soviets are holding out for an aggregate of 2,250 by 1982.

A sublimit of 1,320 MIRVed weapons—also carried forward from Vladivostok—is to become effective at once but now it includes heavy bombers carrying armed air-launched cruise missiles of intermediate range. ICBMs were defined in Geneva as systems with a range of 5,500 kilometers or more but no definition was reached on SLBMs. A further subcategory—within the MIRVed weapons—was created but specific numbers appear to be still under negotiation: The US proposed a maximum combined total of MIRVed ICBM and SLBM launchers at 1,200, whereas the Soviet ceiling was 1,250. Of this total no more than 820 may be MIRVed ICBMs. The Soviets will be permitted to have 326 (or 308, if operational launchers at test ranges are not counted) modern large ballistic missiles (MLBMs) of the SS–18 type. That missile's throw-weight exceeds that of the older SS–9—which US negotiators in 1972 erroneously assumed to represent the maximum permitted throw-weight—by about 4,000 pounds. The remaining MIRVed Soviet ICBMs can be SS–17s and SS–19s whose throw-weights are 7,000 pounds and 8,000 pounds, respectively. The US is not permitted any MLBMs at all.

The fate of USAF's proposed MX missile—with a throw-weight of 7,500 pounds, or slightly less than that of the SS–19—could be adversely affected by SALT II. The reason is that the provisions governing "new" ICBMs, including mobile or unconventionally based systems, are not yet firm. According to Mr. Nitze, the US proposed that during the initial three years of the treaty—the so-called Protocol period—there be no testing of ICBM types not previously tested, and no deployment of types not already deployed at the time the agreement is signed.

Yet another sticking point, congressional sources told Air Force Magazine, is precise definition of what is a "new" and what is a "modified" ICBM. With the Soviets known to have at least five ICBMs, including the mobile SS–16, ready either to join the operational inventory or to enter or continue operational testing, this question becomes crucial. Complicating the definition problem is the tendency of ICBM designers—especially in the Soviet Union—to incorporate proven components in new weapons. Hence the ambiguity inherent in the question of when is a "new" ICBM new in the sense of the treaty.

The Soviet position to date appears to be that the ban should be confined to new MIRVed ICBMs, thus permitting the testing and deployment of any new system, fixed-site or mobile, as long as it carries only a single RV. The implied potential for "breakout," i.e., rapid conversion to MIRVed configuration in case of termination or abrogation of SALT, is conspicuous. So is the problem of verifying whether such weapons indeed remain un-MIRVed.

After the expiration of the Protocol, the treaty language would seem to permit the development, testing, and deployment of mobile or unconventionally based systems. They would, of course, be counted within applicable numerical limits.

Both sides apparently agree that mobile systems and mobile launchers can be tested—but not deployed—during the three-year life of the Protocol, as long as the missile is not actually test-fired from such a launcher. This provision would not seem to shackle the MX program because that system could not be ready for full testing until after the expiration of the Protocol.

OTHER ICBM RESTRICTIONS

Ballistic missiles with a throw-weight greater than that of the SS–18 will be prohibited and all those exceeding the throw-weight of the SS–19—presmably as stipulated by the U.S. since the Soviets refuse to divulge such information—will be counted as MLBMs. The ambiguities that arise from such unilateral definitions would seem to portend rough sledding in the Senate for these provisions. Even under the best of circumstances—and assuming punctilious Soviet adherence to such basically unverifiable commitments as to forego MIRVing of single RV systems and not to seek a silo reload capability—the throw-weight chasm can be expected to widen significantly under SALT II. Mr. Nitze estimated that by 1985 the Soviet throw-weight aggregate residing in their ICBMs will approach 8,000,000 pounds which would translate into about 5,000 RVs, each with a yield several times that of the U.S. warheads. U.S. throw-weight, he predicted, will be 1,250,000 pounds assuming that the number of Minutemen III remains at 550 and is not reduced—as is likely—to accommodate additional bombers and SLBMs.

The consequences of this throw-weight imbalance, when coupled with normal, evolutionary improvements in Soviet warhead accuracy, could be decisive. Congressman Kemp calculates that under the terms of the tentatively approved SALT II Joint Draft Text, the Soviets could develop a capability to destroy up to 4,331 U.S. targets with a blast resistance of 1,000 pounds per square inch, the approximate hardness of some Minuteman silos. "This figure is four times the number of such targets in the United States [hence the U.S.] has agreed to terms that not only eliminate the Minuteman ICBM system as a viable element of our deterrent in the 1980s, but also undermine [the Administration's] plan to use 747-type aircraft to carry cruise missiles, because these aircraft can only use 150 bases, or less, in the entire U.S. because of the great weight of the aircraft."

Mr. Nitze suggested that once Soviet accuracy approaches 0.15 miles, about ninety percent of the US ICBM silos could be destroyed if the Soviets target two RVs on each sile. Such an attack would draw down the Soviet ICBM force by "less than half of the MIRVed ICBM RVs they are expected to have available by 1985. If and when their accuracy approximates a tenth of a mile, around ninety percent of our silos would be vulnerable to an attack by a single RV against each silo, provided that additional RVs are programmed to substitute for missiles that fail during their launch phase." If, on the other hand, the US were to launch all 550 Minuteman IIIs against Soviet silos and "assuming improved accuracy and the substitution of MK–12A for MK–12 RVs, . . . it is unlikely that we could destroy more than sixty percent of them," Mr. Nitze estimated.

A senior Defense official did not deny the basic accuracy of Mr. Nitze's contentions. He did challenge, however, the importance that SALT II opponents ascribe to narrow comparisons of Soviet vs. US MIRVed ICBMs, without regard to the capabilities inherent in the other components of the strategic Triad. Saving ICBMs per se should not be a sine qua non of SALT II, in the Administration's view. Rather, he said, the US objective is to reach terms that permit the US—if necessary—as much payload, as much hard-target kill capability, and as effective a deterrent capability as that of the Soviets. The means for retaining relative balance are to be the air-launched cruise missiles (ALCM) and SLBMs, according to the Defense Department. ALCM's accuracy and range allegedly will be sufficient to destroy Soviet ICBM silos if they are being reloaded with spare missiles in violation of the agreement, the senior Defense official said. Congressional experts on strategic warfare are sceptical about the practicality of such an approach.

CURBS ON SLBMS AND BOMBERS

It is likely that the SLBM balance will continue to slightly favor the US. There is also evidence that the US leads in the ability to detect submerged submarines although eventual advances in Soviet countermeasures technology might negate this US advantage. Whether or not SLBMs can redress the pronounced asymmetry in ICBMs expected in the 1980s is debatable. Neither the Defense Department nor the SALT II opposition expects SLBMs to achieve hard-target kill capabilities within the lifespan of SALT II. The prospect of solving the command and control problem of the Fleet Ballistic Missile force remains dim, in the view of most technical experts. Some defense analysts believe, therefore, that the role assigned to strategic submarines may have to be modified by curtailing their patrol area or using them as a highly survivable strategic reserve, instead of as part of the cutting edge of strategic deterrence.

At this writing, it appears that the Soviets will be authorized about 400 MIRVed SLBMs, assuming that they deploy their quota of 820 MIRVed ICBMs. Neither SALT II nor the three-year-protocol appears to place specific restrictions on deployment of the new Trident submarine or its Soviet counterpart, the twenty to twenty-four launch-tube TYPHOON.

The US appears to be handicapped somewhat, however, because the new Soviet SSNX–18 SLBM, thought to have a range close to 6,000 miles, came in under the wire whereas the US Navy's proposed Trident II SLBM of equal range did not. Trident I can be tested and deployed, but its range of about 4,000 miles does not permit launch from home ports against Soviet targets.

Some terms affecting heavy bombers and cruise missiles are still fluid at this writing. It seems certain, however, that the Soviet Backfire strategic bomber, contrary—according to Representative Beard—to the Joint Chiefs of Staff recommendation, will not be covered by SALT II. Neither apparently will the ninety to 100 heavy Soviet bombers—with bomb bays intact—that have been modified for reconnaissance and antisubmarine warfare missions. SALT II critics report that the Backfire's exemption came about through Soviet willingness to declare, informally and outside the treaty language, that the weapon would not be used in a fashion threatening the United States and that the present production rate would not be increased. There appears to be a colossal catch, however: The Soviets, for reasons known only to themselves, refuse to say what that rate is.

As yet unresolved is the question of whether or not US B–52s in protective storage will count against the SALT limit, unless, of course, they are destroyed voluntarily. At this writing, Administration witnesses are briefing Congress on what is billed as a major, last-minute Soviet concession concerning cruise missiles. A SALT II sticking point, heretofore, had been definition of cruise missile range. These low-flying subsonic weapons obviously are affected by wind and other environmental factors as well as being vulnerable to Soviet air defenses and, therefore, must be programmed to fly around SAM concentrations. Thus, in typical scenarios they will cover about twenty-five percent more distance than the straight-line from launch points to targets. Reportedly, the Soviets have agreed now to define range in light of practical conditions. During the life of the three-year Protocol, test and deployment and cruise missiles with a range of more than 2,500 kilometers is forbidden. By implication, the door is left open to increase that range once the Protocol expires in case changes in Soviet air defenses make it necessary. SALT II critics view this approach with apprehension if not alarm for a number of reasons.

The Joint Chiefs reportedly opposed from the outset initial range restrictions of ALCM to below 3,000 kilometers, and to below 3,500 kilometers following the expiration of the three-year Protocol. Grounds, presumably, were the need to reach the Soviet target complex along the Transsiberian railroad from standoff positions in the face of steady outward expansion of Soviet air defense capabilities. Recent intelligence analyses suggest convincingly that Soviet technology will soon permit moving the air defense perimeter much farther out to sea, possibly up to 1,900 kilometers. Such a development, obviously, would relegate first-generation cruise missiles launched from nonpenetrating platforms to a state of uselessness, especially if linked to massive Soviet deployment of the seven- to fifteen-mile range, low-altitude Soviet SA–X–10 surface-to-air missiles system.

Historical experience supports the argument that ground yielded in agreements with the Soviets is next to impossible to regain. The Administration's plan to extend ALCM's range after expiration of the Protocol—if so required—can be seen as doubly weak since the Soviet Union will not be required to reduce the aggregate of its nuclear delivery vehicles until that very time. As Mr. Nitze asked rhetorically: "Is it inconceivable that in the event we do not wish to renew certain provisions of the Protocol when it expires the Soviets might see some necessity to review the treaty terms?"

Critics of pertinent SALT II formulations see another catch in connection with air-launched cruise missiles. These intermediate-range weapons, contrary to some portrayals, are not independent from their launching platform. The viability of the bomber/cruise missile system depends on a number of factors: The prelaunch survivability of the bombers; sufficient hardness of the bombers to survive enemy barrage bombing of their escape routes; the ability of the bombers to penetrate close enough to the target without getting shot down; the ability to launch enough ALCMs to overload the defenses; and, lastly, the capacity of the cruise missile to penetrate area and terminal defenses and to strike the target with enough accuracy to destroy it. With the B–1 canceled, the proposed FB–111H program scuttled by Congress before it got off the ground, and the Backfire getting a free ride from SALT II, the cruise missile equation takes on a totally new meaning. On the strength of the Administration's SALT proposals for sublimits within the 1,320 MIRVed weapons ceiling it is being assumed that the US plans to equip about 120 B–52s with ACLMs.

As Mr. Nitze argued convincingly, it would be unlikely that more than about fifty percent of the B–52s would be on continuous alert or that more than about seventy percent could be maintained at full readiness during crisis periods requiring fully-generated strategic forces. From the Soviet perspective, the picture looks considerably brighter. There are no US air defenses to speak of, and the Backfire arsenal can be proliferated with impunity. (Even conservative CIA estimates foresee a force of 400 of these advanced strategic bombers.) If this assumption is correct, two conditions would obtain that threaten to negate US plans for maintaining strategic stability: The Soviet Union, within the next few years, would be able to deliver substantially more megatonnage on the US with its bomber force than this country could bring to bear on the USSR, and the component of the US strategic forces counted on to offset the Soviet lead in ICBMs—the bomber/cruise missile system—turns out to be a deficit position itself. Hence this dire warning by Mr. Nitze: "Under the now most likely provisions of a SALT II agreement we run a high risk of having no B–1, no cruise missiles adequate in numbers and range to penetrate Soviet defenses, no follow-on to the aging Minuteman III, and an SLBM force at sea of [fewer] than twenty-five boats, each constituting four percent of our only reliable deterrent power and thus worth enormous Soviet effort to negate."

SINGLING OUT THEATER WEAPONS

Another late Soviet concession, seen as major by SALT II supporters, is the agreement to permit testing ground-launched (GLCM) and sea-launched (SLCM) cruise missiles over a distance of up to 2,500 kilometers from ground-based launchers. This "concession" does not seem to affect in any way, however, the prohibition of deploying such weapons with a range greater than 600 kilometers. The fact that these theater weapons are an element of SALT II is curious of itself. The Soviet SS-20, a new MIRVed mobile, intermediate ballistic missile with a range of well over 4,000 kilometers, is not counted under SALT II rules, even though its erectors/launchers can accommodate the clearly intercontinental SS-16 from which it differs only by deletion of one of the latter's three stages. Ditto for the Backfire, portrayed by the Soviets as a theater weapon, despite its duel capability due to its intercontinental range. There is little doubt among congressional experts on NATO, and US and European NATO commanders and analysts, that a 600-kilometer ground-launched cruise missile is not cost-effective and will not be built. Pershing IIs present range exceeds the proposed GLCM limit and could be extended to about 2,500 kilometers without degrading the weapons high accuracy, and without being hamstrung by SALT II, congressional analysts point out.

GLCM/SLCM weapons are embroiled in another SALT II dispute, the so-called noncircumvention and nontransfer clauses covering technologies of potentially strategic utility. The Soviet contention is that US transfer of such technologies to its allies—in the main satellite-derived terrain data used to keep cruise missiles on course, and high-energy fuel technology—could lead to a circumvention of SALT because one or more NATO powers could build GLCMs with a range greater than 600 kilometers. US willingness to entertain Soviet requests to shut out US allies has caused a rift between this nation and its European allies. As a prominent congressional source told Air Force Magazine, "The notion that we tell our allies, 'No, we can't give you the information needed to help offset the widening Warsaw Pact lead because we have made common cause with our mutual adversary,' boggles the mind."

THE VERIFICATION PROBLEM

SALT II critics uniformly view the lack of verification—beginning with the Soviet refusal to disclose essential information about their strategic capabilities, including numbers and performance characteristics—as a potentially fatal flaw of SALT II as it stands today. Even under the best of circumstances, compliance with SALT terms is difficult to verify. Verification becomes impossible if what is to be limited and the nature of the limitation have not been clearly defined. "How do you determine," Mr. Nitze and other critics have asked, "that a new missile having the throw-weight of an SS-19 and carrying the SS-19 bus, but with a single RV, is not capable of being deployed as a MIRVed missile? How do you determine that retired missiles, or missiles taken out of retired launchers, or extra newly produced missiles are not stockpiled and available for relatively prompt deployment on soft pads or reloaded in launchers using the cold launch technique."

This late in the SALT game it is not likely that the fundamental tone of the pending agreement can be changed. The near-mystic belief that any arms accord is better than none, linked to the notion that nuclear war is unthinkable and strategic asymmetries therefore inconsequential, have provided SALT with an unstoppable momentum. Even the most vocal critics of SALT are resigned to its inevitability. Most of them are resolved—if the accord is ratified by the Senate—to concentrate efforts on assuring that all the steps permitted the US in maintaining perceived essential equivalence in the future will indeed be taken. There is consensus that the first and most crucial step here must be MX, the system that Representative Beard predicts would demonstrate to the Soviets "the folly of an arms race [thus causing them] to accept an equitable SALT agreement which would contribute to long-term strategic stability and world peace."●

OPINION SUBMITTED ON PUBLIC WORKS PROGRAM

HON. FRED B. ROONEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. ROONEY. Mr. Speaker, on March 10, 1978, one of my constituents submitted testimony to two subcommittees of the House Committee on Public Works and Transportation. These two subcommittees, Economic Development and Investigations and Review, were holding oversight hearings on the local public works program of the Economic Development Administration. Mr. H. Robert Daws, chairman of the board of supervisors of Palmer Township, Northampton County, Pa., was asked by the National Association of Towns and Townships (NATaT) to submit this testimony because he serves as chairman of the executive committee of the Pennsylvania State Association of Township Supervisors. Mr. Daws was accompanied by Mr. Barton D. Russell, NATaT's executive director.

NATaT is a federation which represents public officials from over 13,000 communities around the country. Through its national support center in Washington, NATaT provides assistance to local governments on a wide variety of public management matters.

The National Association of Towns and Townships is unique among Washington-based public interest groups in that it is the only one comprised predominantly of smaller communities, those under 50,000 in population. Considering that well over one-half of all Americans live in such localities, NATaT provides the focus for a vital intergovernmental perspective.

The following is Mr. Daws' testimony:

My township of Palmer, located in eastern Pennsylvania, has a combination of urban, suburban and rural characteristics, and a rapidly growing population of 15,000. Palmer is the site of nearly 300 businesses and has the second largest industrial concentration in Northampton County.

We are honored to have been invited to these hearings by Chairman Roe to provide the Subcommittees with the perspective of smaller communities in general, and townships in particular, concerning the Local Public Works Program. We would like to thank both Chairman Roe and Chairman Ginn for the opportunity to comment on this very important subject.

LOCAL PUBLIC WORKS—ROUND I

Needless to say, the administration of Round I of the LPW Program did not enjoy a favorable review during the oversight hearings last year. The record showed a clear dissatisfaction on the part of many public officials concerning, among other things, the eligibility criteria which allowed some local governments to use the higher unemployment data of a neighboring jurisdiction to improve their own chances of receiving a grant. Another widely criticized provision was the 70%-30% split of Round I funds. These two aspects of the program are not now really significant, since the Economic Development Administration revised its Round II procedures and eliminated both provisions from the allocation formula.

One point related to the administration of Round I which is worth focusing on, however, is the charge by many big city officials that smaller communities received a disproportionately high level of funding. While it is acknowledged that some localities did receive substantial grants in consideration of their relatively small population, a look at figures provided by EDA officials in January 1977 shows that, on a national scale, urban areas were not shortchanged. Sixty-five percent of the Round I funds went to localities within Standard Metropolitan Statistical Areas (SMSAs). In my own state of Pennsylvania, 28.9 percent of the total allocation went to the cities of Philadelphia and Pittsburgh, while only 6.9 percent went to 12 rural counties. These non-metropolitan areas received $5.8 million to alleviate an unemployment rate of 7.39 percent and to lower the number of unemployed workers from a total of 51,079. Pittsburgh, by comparison, received $11 million to cope with a similar unemployment rate of 7.16 percent and 45,532 unemployed workers.

An examination of the Round I program nationally shows similar findings. However, the objections of the big city mayors about the supposed small-town bias, and the attendant media coverage which they received, had a profound effect on the administration of Round II.

ABSOLUTE NUMBERS OF UNEMPLOYED

As indicated in testimony presented last year to the Economic Development Subcommittee by a representative of the National Association of Towns and Townships, NATaT voiced its opposition to EDA's project selection criteria for Round II, which emphasized the absolute number of unemployed people living within an applicant's jurisdiction. This ranking factor provided for an obvious urban tilt and discriminated unfairly against smaller, less densely populated communities.

We recognize that a system which places total emphasis on an applicant's unemployment rate would not be equitable either, and if there is to be another round in the LPW Program, we urge EDA officials to develop an appropriate and fairer mid-point between these two major application rating factors.

PROJECT LOCATION ERRORS

One serious problem with the administration of Round II of the LPW program related to EDA's inability in some cases to distinguish certain units of local government, such as townships, from other municipalities within the same county which had a similar name or a different postal address. As Congressman Roe knows, this caused problems in his own state of New Jersey, as well as in the states of Michigan, Ohio, New York and, indeed, in my state of Pennsylvania. In fact, this problem affected my township of Palmer directly.

Palmer Township filed two applications under Round I, both of which were "shelved" until Round II. Because our township does not have its own post office, the mailing address listed on our application was Easton, Pennsylvania, a small city near Palmer. According to a study done by the U.S. General Accounting Office in August 1977, this type of situation was what caused the program administration difficulties: "Apparently, the grant application did not call for the address of the project or otherwise identify its location, but instead only required the applicant's address—and the two were not always the same."

While we know it is not within the purview of the Subcommittees, we believe this problem could easily be solved by developing separate and distinct Zip Codes to identify each municipality or political subdivision within each state. Such an approach would allow the identification of local government bodies in much the same way as Social Security numbers identify individuals.

Short of such a major operational change in current postal practices, NATaT suggests that EDA's computers be programed in a manner similar to the program used by the Office of Revenue Sharing. The ORS system allows for direct communication and coordination between the central office and all general local governments, large and small.

E.D.A. AND PUBLIC WORKS—A POSITIVE PROGRAM

While it is easy to criticize a program such as LPW for certain perceived inequities and deficiencies, the National Association of Towns and Townships believes that the program represents a pioneering countercyclical effort. EDA should be commended for its effectiveness in processing so quickly the many thousands of applications it received and getting the money to the communities where it has been used to provide jobs and fund projects that otherwise would have been impossible.

Our township of Palmer, in particular, is grateful for the support of this program, which has had a catalytic effect upon our community despite the low level of funding received. Through a positive federal and local partnership, we were able to take "off the shelf" a major development plan for a 94-acre industrial site which had been dormant for several years due to a lack of start-up funds. As a result of the flexibility under Round II regulations which allowed local officials to set their own priorities, Palmer was able to initiate construction of a tower which, in turn, allowed the Industrial Development Corporation to construct a water distribution system. Ultimately the LPW grant we received from EDA will result in the development of an expanded industrial site which will provide much-needed job and business opportunities for our citizens.

L.P.W.: A FEDERAL ASSISTANCE PROTOTYPE FOR THE FUTURE

The National Association of Towns and Townships believes that the local Public Works Program is a one-of-a-kind federal program which works and works well. We believe that it has been and can continue to be a federal assistance effort which effectively stimulates the local and therefore the national economy—as it is necessary.

NATaT encourages the subcommittees to consider legislation providing for at least a third round and possibly establishing a permanent LPW Program. Certainly in light of the vast number of previous applications for assistance there can be no doubt that a tremendous need exists.

A SMALL COMMUNITIES SET-ASIDE

If future rounds of the program are provided for, NATaT also recommends the consideration of a special set-aside of public works dollars for smaller communities under 50,000 in population. The program could theoretically be similar in intent to the smaller community program provided for by the Community Development Act of 1977. This approach recognizes that smaller communities are different in nature from large cities. It recognizes that many small communities are managed by part-time elected officials such as myself. The administration of a Small Community LPW Program could provide for simplicity, less red tape, and specialized technical assistance efforts. A Small Communities set-aside should, of course, be funded on a fair and equitable basis.

Again, I would like to thank Chairman Roe and Chairman Ginn, on behalf of the National Association of Towns and Townships, for providing us the opportunity to share our experiences and viewpoints relative to the Local Public Works Program. Both subcommittees and their respective staffs should be commended for their diligent and untiring efforts to improve the program itself and the National economy as a whole.

Thank you.●

IN MULTI-ETHNIC QUEENS, THE FAMILY IS MANKIND

HON. BENJAMIN S. ROSENTHAL

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. ROSENTHAL. Mr. Speaker, I wish to share with my colleagues an informative article that well illustrates the ethnic diversity of Queens. The piece, which was written by Salvatore LaGumina, appeared in Newsday on March 5, 1978. It describes the borough as a kaleidoscope of ethnic groups and the new heart of New York City's melting pot. The article follows:

IN MULTI-ETHNIC QUEENS, THE FAMILY IS MANKIND

"All in the Family," the hit television show of recent years, revolves around the fears and prejudices of Archie Bunker, a bigoted white American living in a row house off Northern Boulevard in Queens. In weekly episodes viewers are regaled or angered by incidents in the life of the Bunker household, which frequently show the narrow-minded family head venting his spleen against ethnic groups with choice epithets.

Over the years, the show has been criticized by people sincerely rankled by such crude reminders of ethnic prejudice; yet its defenders are quick to point out that the show's success reflects the willingness of the average American to deal with the reality of ethnic pluralism in our midst.

Whatever the viewpoint, one can acknowledge that, in selecting Queens as a laboratory for ethnic diversity in our times, the producers of "All in the Family" were not far from the mark: Queens is indeed a polyglot borough. Ethnic diversity has been a characteristic of the borough's history for many years.

Half a centuy ago the population mix of the county was represented by considerable concentrations of Germans, Irish, Italians, Austrians and Russians. Currently, however, the ethnic mix reflects the addition of newer peoples who were hardly found in the U.S. Census Bureau statistics of 1920: Greeks, Filipinos, Haitians, Koreans, Dominicans.

More than any other part of New York City, one can conclude that Queens today is the real center of the city's melting pot, to use an overused and inaccurate phrase. The Manhattan of old sported recognizable ethnic neighborhoods, such as Chinatown, the Lower East Side (Jewish), Little Italy and Yorktown (German), all presenting visible evidence of high percentages of ethnic groups and accordingly honored in song and story. But today Queens has replaced Manhattan as an ethnic borough, boasting the highest percentage of foreign-born stock of any borough (more than 50 per cent), although Brooklyn has a higher absolute number.

The ethnic communities of Queens are more varied than ever. The borough still has the traditional white ethnic groups of yesteryear: the Jews of Forest Hills and Rochdale, the Italians of Ozone Park, the Irish of Flushing and Bayside, the Germans of Woodhaven. But many of the older groups have been forced to make room for the newer ones.

Astoria is a case in point. A generation ago the main ethnic group was Italian and, although that group is still numerous, a Greek presence is making itself felt. Indeed a resilient, lively and exciting Greek-American enclave of 60,000 has surfaced, replete with its family nightclubs featuring belly dancers, its kaffensions, which serve thick Greek coffee, and its Greek Orthodox churches, such as the venerable Transfiguration of Christ Church, the center of many social and cultural activities. Moreover, it is a true Greek community, keenly aware of its roots. During the recent time of trouble in Cyprus, a Greek-American ice-cream truck in Astoria had a large photo of the late president Archbishop Makarios taped to its side. A young, vigorous community, its people work long days at their jobs, invest in and improve their homes and vitalize community organizations.

Woodside is another example of a changing Queens neighborhood. During the 1950s, the neighborhood was populated largely by Irish-Americans and to a lesser extent German-Americans. In 1955, for example, Woodside Public School II was approximately 97 per cent Irish, Northern European and Anglo-Saxon. Today that same school is perhaps only 3 per cent Irish and the Northern European-Anglo-Saxon cast has given way to a student body covering an ethnic spectrum from oriental to Latin, encompassing blacks, Chinese, Cubans, Japanese, Puerto Ricans, Koreans, Indians, Colombians, Brazilians, Venezuelans, Filipinos, Russians and Ecuadorians. The sympoms of ethnic change are evident in the shops that dot Roosevelt Avenue: Colombian restaurants, Spanish bodegas, Korean supermarkets and Irish bars.

For some, the changing ethnic environment has brought upheaval. Thus in 1972 the predominantly Jewish community of Forest Hills proffered the astonishing spectacle of a liberal middle-class community fighting the building of a housing project, seeming thereby to align itself against racial integration. The neighborhood of better-off Conservative and Orthodox Jews resisted the project because they equated the low-cost scattered-housing project with an inevitable increase in crime. What made the situation even more astonishing was the fact that it pitted a Jewish population that traditionally supported integration against blacks, who were expected to be the largest ethnic group to be introduced into the neighborhood as a result of the project.

The Italian-Americans of Corona who settled the area early in the century, many building their own one- and two-family homes, found themselves confronted with a Lindsay administration plan calling for construction of a public high school that would have destroyed the heart of the closely-knit community. They resisted successfully; the plans were changed, although a number of Italian-Americans concluded they could no longer remain in the neighborhood.

Problems of adjustment are perceived not only by the population of ethnic neighborhoods but also by the newcomers, who realize only too well the obstacles before them as they try to obtain a foothold in society. The problem of finding adequate housing is especially serious for darker-skinned ethnic groups, along with the difficulties in obtaining the full array of educational and other services. Thus issues dealing with bilingualism in schools, minority representation in the school systems and social service agencies and opportunities for job advancement are among the things they worry about.

For Queens, what is remarkable is that, on the whole, the borough remains a desirable place to live. I hope that the older ethnic groups come to see the newcomers as enriching and vitalizing forces, just as they and their parents enriched and enlivened the Queens of half a century ago. To the extent they are able to do so they will have relegated Archie Bunker to the past.●

THE CAMPAIGN FINANCING FIASCO

HON. ROMANO L. MAZZOLI

OF KENTUCKY

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. MAZZOLI. Mr. Speaker, as a strong and consistent advocate of public financing—twice I have voted in the House for this needed reform—I was greatly distressed to be placed in a position of appearing to vote against public financing.

Many of my colleagues and many private congressional oversight groups—like Common Cause—urged me to vote for the bill changing the Federal Election's Act in order to get a vote on public financing of congressional races.

However, that measure was odious and so lacking in merit, that I could not do so despite my personal commitment to public financing of House races.

I believe that the following Washington Post editorial explains well the situation in which I found myself.

[From the Washington Post, Mar. 23, 1978]

THE CAMPAIGN FINANCING FIASCO

The House's Republicans and 69 of its Democrats did good work Tuesday when they shelved the campaign regulation bill. The bill's worst feature had been a Democratic attempt to counteract the Republicans' fundraising success by sharply curbing political parties' contributions to House campaigns. After muscling this partisan amendment through the House Administration Committee, chairman Frank Thompson (D-N.J.) and his allies did promise to delete it on the House floor if the GOP would agree to bring up the bill. Apparently fearing more mischief, the Republicans refused and voted as a bloc against considering the bill at all.

The other target of opposition was the plan for public financing of House campaigns, which a bipartisan coalition, spurred by Common Cause, had been poised to offer on the House floor. The backers of this plan may try to revive it and are already describing its shelving this week as a blow to "reform." So let's look at a few of the "reforms" it would involve.

For one thing, public financing is often praised as a way of "opening up the system" and making campaigns more competitive. The House plan could have the opposite effect. It would offer public funds to match small individual gifts to House campaigns, up to $50,000 in subsidies per candidate. The would help poorly financed candidates get some messages to the voters. But it would not apply to primaries. And who would be most likely to raise lots of small donations and get the big subsidies? Not fledgling candidates most strapped for funds, but incumbents and others who are already well known or waging highly publicized fights for vacant seats. Spending reports on the 1976 House campaigns suggests that an average House incumbent could easily qualify for a $50,000 grant, while an average challenger might be able to match only $25,000 or so.

The plan would promote equity in some cases, but this aspect, too, has severe flaws. It would give candidates extra public aid if their opponents benefit from large independent outlays by interest groups, or decide to forego the subsidies and spend more than $150,000 in private funds. There are several things wrong with that. It makes the judgment that some kinds of constitutionally protected political activity—free spending by individuals and groups to promote their own candidacies or views—are "excessive" or "bad." It assumes that government should impose that judgment and provide a financial counterweight, instead of simply disclosing the spending and letting voters judge its desirability for themselves. Indeed, experience shows that lavish spending by rich candidates or well-heeled interest groups often becomes a campaign issue anyway—and does not necessarily bring victory at the polls.

On those two grounds alone, the plan deserved to be shelved. It may be possible to devise a modest program that would ease candidates' access to the marketplace without distorting political competition in new, troubling ways. This wasn't it.●

CONCERN SHOWN FOR U.S. NAVY

HON. BOB WILSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. BOB WILSON. Mr. Speaker, I continue to be most concerned about the state our Navy is in and the direction the administration would have it proceed. Already rocked by reductions in its fleet, this present cut would bring it to its lowest ebb in half a century—exactly at a time when it is never more important to be strong. We must have an ongoing program to strengthen our fleets, and the proposals put forward by the administration would have just the opposite and most deleterious effect. An editorial in today's San Diego Union points out the dangers inherent in President Carter's methodology most succinctly and I commend it to the attention of my colleagues:

CARTER'S NAVAL TWIG

Instead of speaking softly and carrying a big stick, as Teddy Roosevelt urged, Jimmy Carter talks tough and then reaches for a twig.

In a militant speech at Wake Forest University on March 18, the President warned the Soviet Union against continuing its massive buildup of military might, which far exceeds defensive requirements. Otherwise, he said the United States and its allies would strengthen their own armed forces as necessary. "We will modernize our strategic systems and revitalize our conventional forces," he said.

Mr. Carter's first official act after returning to Washington from announcing this new and sterner policy was to slash by more than half the Navy's shipbuilding program for the next five years.

Instead of implementing a plan on the drawing boards since the Ford Administration days to build 156 new ships and modernize 20 existing ones, the President and the Pentagon propose 70 new ships and 13 modernizations; of these, only 46 would be combatant vessels.

Thus, the 800-ship Navy thought necessary to defend American interests around the world is being whittled down to a 375-ship Navy designed, not for mastery of the seas, but merely for the convoy duty that administration strategies have assigned it.

In direct contrast with our weakened Navy is the Russian drive for overwhelming sea power. As we have cut back our fleet, the Soviets have doubled and redoubled theirs; with 981 ships to our 462, they are about twice as strong in every warship category except aircraft carriers. For example, there are 230 attack submarines to our 77 and 195 destroyer/frigates to our 122.

This discrepancy is too ominous to be ignored.

Why, then, is the President ignoring it? In view of the Soviet challenge and the obvious need for new naval construction to match it, he can only cite costs behind his action, which he does—the requirement to hold down federal spending.

Unfortunately, the Navy's own house is not in order. The President points to shipbuilding delays and cost overruns that amount to almost $3 billion. Whether these are due to mismanagement by the shipbuilders, as the Navy charges, or niggling Navy changes in design is beside the point; the problem provides Mr. Carter with some logic and rationalization for his new policy of cutting back the Navy.

We have no quarrel with the President for challenging the Navy to be more efficient and more economical. The trouble is he does not apply the same yardstick to his domestic programs, some of which are grossly wasteful and inefficient, which he has been approving almost every week of late in response to political pressure from one group or another. Standards imposed by the White House and Pentagon on the Navy are noticeably absent from the recently announced farm subsidization program and the new national urban program, where billions of dollars expended over the years have come to very little.

The fact is a Navy rebuilding program on a scale to meet the Soviet challenge would help to energize the American economy, provide thousands of jobs, and generate new tax revenues. And this appears attainable, if given the proper priority within the overall national budget, without weakening other defense commitments, including those to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

The point is that the United States is a continental island, dependent on mastery of the seas for its raw materials and for support of its allies around the world. We must rely upon a strong Navy all the way from the Middle East to Japan if we are not to forfeit our influence in international affairs.

It is time the American people aroused themselves from their complacency to this particular peril. It is not enough to hope that our national survival should command the same kind of effective political pressure that is producing so much spending on the domestic front.●

BYELORUSSIA: 60TH ANNIVERSARY

HON. RAYMOND F. LEDERER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. LEDERER. Mr. Speaker, March 25 was a memorable day in the history of the people of Byelorussia and their many compatriots living in the United States because on that day in 1918 they realized their centuries-old dream and found themselves free again. Unfortunately, their hopes and aspirations were short-lived, because very shortly after their independence the new State was invaded by the Soviets, and Byelorussia as a nation ceased to exist.

Yet, the people of that unfortunate land never gave up their dreams. Even the Soviets had to recognize the fact they do not consider themselves an integral part of the Soviet Empire, since they have insisted that Byelorussia should have a separate vote in the United Nations.

We in the United States firmly believe in the principles of self-determination.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, on March 25 we celebrated the 60th anniversary of the proclamation of the Byelorussia Democratic Republic signed in Miensk, capital of Byelorussia, on March 25, 1918. Our efforts for human rights throughout the world have no better example than the spirit and determination of the Byelorussian peoples in their homeland and those of that heritage in our country.●

LINCOLN ESSAY CONTEST WINNER

HON. DEL CLAWSON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. DEL CLAWSON. Mr. Speaker, a project of the League of Republican Women of the District of Columbia is, in my opinion, worthy of commendation. It is an annual Lincoln essay contest, a program initiated this year in a special invitation to seniors of public, private, and parochial schools of the District of Columbia. This year's winner was Stephen Gander, a student at St. John's High School. The award was postponed from February to March because of this year's weather, but the presentation was made on March 6. It is a pleasure to include the winning essay at this point, in the RECORD. The essay follows:

ABRAHAM LINCOLN'S COMMITMENT TO CIVIL AND HUMAN RIGHTS AND OUR RESPONSIBILITY TO PRESERVE THESE RIGHTS

Rights—individual rights, equal rights, human rights, civil rights—all of these phrases have taken on specific and often individualistic meanings, yet they really convey one major concept. Two words envelop this concept completely. The world has sought it since time immemorial. Writers, philosophers, and statesmen have often defined, debated, and discussed it—yet have almost always agreed that it was lacking in society. It, is justice. The basic elementary, simple concept of social justice.

Many great leaders can be identified as champions of this great cause. One, however, stands out vividly not only in American but also in other lands, primarily because of his powerful impact and firm resolve. That man was the sixteenth president of the United States of America, Abraham Lincoln. His whole life was wrapped up in the principle of social justice, and it came to fruition in his presidency. During that critical juncture in our nation's history, he calmly and courageously stood steadfast in his desire to see social justice triumph so that men could live in harmony. His goal was not one of punishment or repression for those who did not agree with his way of viewing social justice, but rather one of reconciliation and understanding. His moderation, freedom from bitterness, and disdain for the exercise of power for its own sake has served as a model for all who were to follow. Through his firmness of purpose and great moral principles a people were freed and a nation saved. What a superb foundation upon which to build he has left us, for unfortunately the maintenance of social justice has proved to be a never ending task. Thus the legacy he left is a challenge to us and future generations to not only guard the freedoms which we now enjoy, but also to work for social justice in areas where it has yet to become a reality. An eloquent statement, but one might think it too idealistic to be accomplished. I challenge that viewpoint for I believe that it can and must be done.

Let me first explain that I do not have any clear cut blueprint as to how to achieve permanent, never-ending social justice. But I do have some ideas as to how each of us can, in our own way continue the commitment to equal justice for all.

Politically, since we are fortunate enough to be a government ". . . of the people, by the people, and for the people, . . ." let us continue to exercise our voting rights. We must research the policies and personalities of those who would seek to govern, as well as those who are governing. Determine how they view the concept of social justice. More importantly see how they are working for it. Actions speak louder than words, and responsible legislation by those who would seek to make the laws should be the ultimate criterion and prime factor in deciding who should be entrusted with the duty to govern.

Economically the answer to social justice does not lie in a redistribution of wealth, but instead in an equitable distribution of wealth. Very simply—a "just" wage for "just" labor. In that context both the employee and the employer share mutual respect for each others contribution to society. Neither feels disadvantaged and the opportunity is always present for one to decide just how much time, and effort he wishes to expend to bring about the economic conditions under which he desires to live. Individual freedom and initiative are paramount, but also important is "just" remuneration for one's efforts.

Socially, we should rededicate ourselves to ". . . the proposition that all men are created equal." Morally we know this to be true. Regardless of race, creed, or ethnic origin all men have the same basic human needs and desires. Why then should one group be singled out as superior or "different"? What insecurity or fear causes hatred and bitterness? These questions should constantly be addressed and debated, so that by raising each other's consciousness we all may begin to see in our neighbor the reflection of God.

These basic ideas are not new, but if they are really pursued they can lead to the fulfillment of man's basic desire for social justice. Lincoln saw this to be true and gave his life for the principles in which he believed. The majority of us will not be called upon to make the ultimate sacrifice, all we are asked to do is continue the legacy which he has left. Is that too hard? I don't think so. I deeply believe that there is in our country, and even in the world a new awareness and a resolve to end man's inhumanity to man. It is our duty to see that this continues, for if we fail, humanity's end will not be far behind.●

"ROME'S FALL: CAN IT HAPPEN TO US?"

HON. STEVEN D. SYMMS

OF IDAHO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. SYMMS. Mr. Speaker, during recent years many different writers and historians have compared the parallels between the events that led to the fall of the Roman Empire and the present trends in the United States today. During 1968 the Philadelphia Inquirer ran a series of articles by Dr. Robert Strausz-Hupe dealing with such a parallel.

With the recent passage of the Humphrey-Hawkins income redistribution legislation by this House and the current status of the SALT proposals with the Soviet Union, I think it most appropriate to commend the Strausz-Hupe essay to my colleagues in Congress. The essay is rather lengthy so I will read it into the RECORD in two parts. Part two will appear in tomorrow's RECORD:

ROME'S FALL: CAN IT HAPPEN TO US?

(By Dr. Robert Strausz-Hupe)

EERIE SIMILARITIES NOTED IN PRESENT, PAST CIVILIZATION

Because our civilization possess resources of energy vastly greater than any of its predecessors and, in this respect, is truly novel, it is easy to assume that the lessons of history, interesting and diverting as they might be for their own sake, do not apply to us.

Widely held as this assumption is, only a few educated men care to state it quite as bluntly as I have done here.

In our educational system, the study of history occupies a highly respected place. Our scholars, armed with the methods of modern science, have gathered an immense amount of historical facts, uncovered the secrets of long buried cultures, and bared the most intimate details of men's lives throughout the millenia of civilized existence. We know more about history than any and all generations before us.

Yet the question need be asked: Do we fully understand the many things we know? Are we so confident of the power which knowledge of the past gives us that we need not fear repeating the fatal mistakes of the past, the "dead" civilizations?

The Founding Fathers were deeply steeped in the history of ancient Greece and Rome. Not a few among them were able to read the works of Plato and Thucydides, and of Livy and Tacitus in the original texts.

Their political ideas were shaped not only by the political thinkers of the 17th and 18th centuries—as, for example, Locke and Hume who, themselves, drew upon the Greek and Roman experience—but also by their own schooling in the history of Roman statecraft.

Indeed, the concept of the "separation of powers" which inspired the making of the American Constitution probably derived from the writing of the Greek philosopher-statesman Polybius, who, in the second century before Christ, recorded the rise of the Roman Republic and extolled the checks and balances of the Roman constitution.

Like most educated men of their times, the Founding Fathers believed that, by the right use of reason, men could improve themselves and create a more perfect society. They believed in progress.

Proven right

They also believed that progress could not be taken for granted, and that the many dangers besetting a free society called for the constant vigilance and patriotic dedication of its members.

They were proven right on both counts: No country has progressed more rapidly than the United States; American progress under freedom has been achieved by the vigorous initiative and hard work of individual men and women, and safeguarded by the American people's willingness, in times of stress, to put the common good above individual interest.

Can we now assume that these conditions will always obtain in the future—that we have, once and for all, insured continuous progress and solved the key problem of the relationship of man and state, namely, how much does each owe to the other?

No prudent man would care to answer this question positively.

Despite novel forecasting techniques, the future of human society is now as unpredictable as it has always been. And even if the future were more certain than I believe it to be, we would still have to know whence we came in order to know where we are heading.

It is this circumstance which suggested to the great statesmen of all times the study of history and, especially, the history of ancient Rome.

The history of Rome spans a long time, much longer than the history of any contemporary Western state. It records an immense variety of political and social changes.

Similarities

It is the history of a highly intelligent and vigorous people who, at the height of their power, succeeded in welding many races into a universal state, leader of the known world.

Last but not least, Roman history is well documented: we know more about it than we know about any great civilization of the past.

Such historians as Oswald Spengler, Guglielmo Ferrero and Amaury de Riencourt have noted certain similarities in the urban life of the Romans and the Americans respectively, as well as the resemblance of the United States' position as leading world power to the pre-eminence of Rome in the ancient world.

This is far from saying that the Romans of nearly 2000 years ago were "like" Americans of the 20th century. Of course, they were not.

Yet some of the achievements and vicissitudes of the Romans evoke in us a sense of almost eerie familiarity—like meeting a perfect stranger and feeling that we have known him all the time.

The Romans were prodigious engineers: they built roads wherever they went, in Europe, Africa and Asia, and probably built them even more durably than ours, for some of them are still in use today.

Like the Americans, the Romans cherished bodily hygiene, the cosmetic arts, and spectator sports. They were inveterate sightseers and tourists.

In some of their major cities, they developed complexes of high-rise apartment houses (some of which were shoddily constructed and, despite stringent building regulations, menaced the health and safety of the infuriated tenants).

City problems

They mastered the art of plumbing and built water supply and sewer systems which were hardly inferior to our own, and some of which still function.

Long before us, they managed to run into the Urban Problem, complete with traffic congestion, slums, ghettos, unemployment and crime.

They tackled the task of Urban Renewal, razed slums and built model cities. Indeed, as planners of towns and splendid community centers, the Romans had no peers until the Americans set out to lift the faces of their urban centers.

The Romans developed a world-wide system of commerce and banking, and foreign-made utensils and luxury goods conferred prestige upon their users.

They were open to intellectual influences from abroad, first, from the Greek-speaking countries under their protection and domination and, then, from the cultural centers of the Middle East.

They thought themselves somewhat too materialist and crude; they were eager and humble students; they adapted what they learned to their own tradition; and they transformed their cultural borrowings into a virile, direct literary style; a grave, noble philosophy; and imposing artistic creations of their own.

It is perhaps in this respect that the analogy of Rome and America fits most closely: the Roman-Hellenic cultural achievement finds its counterpart in the American culture which derives from Europe and yet, in vital thrust and universal attraction, surpasses the European heritage.

Slavery

The Romans, though they produced able engineers and thinkers of scientific bent, did not engage in a systematic study of the laws of nature and, hence, failed to develop an advanced technology. By modern standards, their resources of energy were woefully small.

Some of the reasons for their technological backwardness are now easily explained; some are puzzling and still subject to conjecture.

The frugal Greeks, who taught the Romans so much about the uses of the mind, viewed science as an intellectual pursuit, rewarding for its own sake, and spurned its practical applications as unworthy of wise men.

The economy of Rome, like that of Greece, was based on that institution of antiquity which modern man finds most repugnant, namely, slavery.

More likely than not, Roman imagination stopped short at the threshold of machine technology because cheap and abundant slave labor supplied the "machines" of production.

Let it be noted that the Romans treated their slaves more humanely than some hundred generations of slaveholders after them, and provided them with elaborate protection in law and convention.

Masses of slaves were freed by their masters. Freedmen amassed great wealth and, under the emperors, attained highest office in the state and academic distinction.

Yet, the blemish of slavery distorted the moral countenance of Rome—and, probably, arrested its technical and economic development.

Blind reliance

Here the gap between modern America and ancient Rome is wide, unbridgeably wide. Yet, notwithstanding this, we must ask whether our machine technology makes us proof against all those destructive forces which plagued Roman society and, ultimately, wrecked Roman civilization.

Our reliance—an almost religious reliance—upon the power of science and technology to forever insure the progress of our society, might blind us to some very real problems which cannot be solved by science and technology.

These problems find their counterpart in the Roman experience, scant as were Rome's resources of machine power.

Some of the most crucial issues confronting America are political and moral. For their study, the lessons of history are timeless.

About their nature, Roman history might have much to tell us that we need to learn—perhaps only in order to satisfy ourselves that what happened to the Romans can never happen to us.

OPPRESSIVE TAXATION, CREEPING INFLATION LED EMPIRE TO RUIN

In the second century after the birth of Christ, the Roman Empire achieved its greatest prosperity and external security. Under the rule of Trajan, Hadrian, Antoninus Pius and Marcus Aurelius, which spans nearly 100 years, the military strength of Rome deterred or overwhelmed foreign aggressors. Internally, the empire insured the safety of individuals and their property as effectively as a modern state, if not more effectively.

The rulers encouraged the building of new towns and the improvement of the older municipalities. In these urban centers, a middle class consisting of tradesmen, manufacturers, contractors, judges, lawyers, municipal officials, and independent artisans grew steadily in numbers and in wealth.

Class mobility

Access to this middle class was, by our standards, democratic. Many of its members were Roman by neither birth nor extraction; many were descendants of peasant-soldiers, recruited from all over the empire, upon whom enlistment had conferred Roman citizenship and who were rewarded by a grant of land in the provinces.

In this epoch, the Roman society enjoyed a high degree of what our sociologists now call "upward mobility." Industry and intelligence received their fair rewards.

Although not all subject peoples qualified automatically for Roman citizenship, the emperors made it increasingly easy for the members of non-Roman and non-Italian communities to become Roman citizens.

All Roman citizens were liable for military service; all Roman citizens were as equal before the law as are now the citizens of any democratic community.

Judicial equality

As a matter of fact, the principle of judicial equality, as well as of due process, is Rome's bequest to our courts of law.

The Roman State, seeking to foster the rise of a middle class, not only did not interfere with economic competition but actively encouraged it.

Although the imperial bureaucracy was salaried, most local offices were honorific and administered without pay by individuals chosen by the community.

If, at any time in history, a people could have looked confidently to the future, it was the Roman people in the second century of our era: at the frontiers stood an invincible army; within the empire, law and order prevailed, and never did almost everybody "have it so good."

Seen in retrospect, all Rome had to do in order to perpetuate this happy state of affairs was to follow the enlightened course she had staked out at the beginning of her Golden Age. No foreign power could challenge her, and her growing middle class furnished the seemingly inexhaustible wellspring of progress.

Idle increase

Why did this splendid and benign civilization decline at all? And why did it decline so rapidly that, within another 100 years, the Roman Empire was plunged irreversibly into anarchy and penury, ravaged by foreign aggressors, and doomed to extinction?

Undoubtedly, one cause of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire can be found in the enduring nature of man: his capacity for self-delusion and complacency in good times.

Some of the other causes can be understood only by examining the special circumstances surrounding the evolution of Roman society, and it is these causes that are of greatest interest and relevance today.

As we have seen, the power and prosperity of the Roman Empire at its height rested upon the valor of its citizen-soldiers and the enterprise of her middle class.

If we can identify the forces which undermined these two key supports of the Roman State, we will come as close to explaining the collapse of Rome as we can come to explaining anything about a people remote from us by nearly 2000 years.

Already during the century preceding the long reign of the Good Emperors, astute contemporaries had noted certain alarming trends in Roman life.

One of these was the increase of idle people in Rome, the idle rich and the idle poor.

This trend was fostered by some of the emperors who lavishly rewarded their favorites—pliant politicians and military, as well as contractors and financiers with an inside track to the government—and bid for the acclaim of the Roman masses by the inauguration of welfare measures such as free meals, a round of sensational entertainments and public services without charge to the consumer.

A large part of the Roman citizenry lived comfortably on the dole. Since, nominally, the emperors, as chief magistrates of the Republic, were elected officials, the Roman electorate was called upon to sanction their rule.

As a matter of fact, the emperors solved this problem by the massive purchase of votes—and, in fair exchange, the mass of the voters, so recompensed, looked to the government for ever more elaborate welfare measures, free of charge.

Not so surprisingly, the average Roman citizen idle, pleasure-seeking and pampered, felt less and less inclined to do service in the army, once the precious privilege of all free Romans.

It is amazing that, despite these demoralizing tendencies, the empire could, for a long time, find enough high-minded Roman citizens to man its armies and to maintain the traditional standard of Roman military discipline and valor.

Decay sets in

But, by the end of the second century, the dole and decadence had done their work.

The emperors saw themselves forced to rely on mercenaries for the defense of the frontiers.

Most of these mercenaries were recruited from barbarian tribes and the underworld of the cities. Many did not speak Latin and few felt any civic allegiance to the Roman State.

By the third century, the Roman legions had become boisterous bands of ruffians, bent on loot, and terrorizing the feckless, disarmed and helpless civilian population they were supposed to defend against foreign foes.

The traditional virtues of the Romans had made them invincible in war and ennobled their domestic institutions. They were: frugality, gravity, directness, piety and patriotism.

These simple moral values did not commend themselves to the new, the sophisticated philosophies which, originating in the East, swept Rome's intellectual market in the second century.

The alienated intellectual was as much a phenomenon of Roman society as it is of ours.

In Rome, the most popular teachers of new doctrines which heaped contempt and ridicule upon the steady values of the middle class were the Cynics.

Bearded, ragged and professing indifference to worldly goods, these bitter critics of Roman society view with the suave Sophists, academics more fashionable in the great school of learning, for public acclaim—and the patronage of the middle class.

Battening on the very social and economic system which they denounced, some grew influential and rich.

Let us beware of facile historical analogies! Seventeen hundred years before Karl Marx and 1800 years before Professor Marcuse, Rome's disaffected thinkers had not and could not have developed those doctrines of collectivism and anarchism which sparked the revolutionary movements of our times.

Unsafe places

Yet, just as in our times, a profound change in the intellectual and moral climate preceded the breakup of the established order—and that established order not only failed to reaffirm the moral values that had made it rich and powerful, but also embraced the very doctrines which demeaned it.

By the beginning of the third century, Rome's towns and countryside had become unsafe places.

Deserters from the army and escaped criminals beset the unwary traveler and robbed the tradesmen. In this age, the annals of Rome record the increase of riots, some culminating in conflagrations which destroyed whole towns.

The authorities, unable or unwilling to cope with these disorders, indulged the masses of idle people in the cities, seeking their political support in order to quell the growing discontent of the taxpayers—the producers.

Mighty Rome might have withstood civil disorder, the spread of disruptive doctrines, as well as the loss of prestige abroad, and kept on living on its immense accumulated wealth, had she not been smitten by a disease that even her once robust constitution could not tolerate.

Rome died of the twin malady which, throughout history, has laid low the strongest states: confiscatory taxation and creeping inflation.

Under the Emperor Commodus, the ruthless son of mild Marcus Aurelius, the burden of direct taxation began to depress the commerce and industry of the empire.

Under the Emperor Caracalla, that burden crushed the empire's economy and beggared the middle class.

The land tax and the poll tax, the chief taxes paid by lower income brackets, were not raised, but the income tax, which mainly affected the propertied and well-to-do, was sharply increased. The tax on inheritance was doubled.●

DEMOCRATS: MASTERY YIELDS TO DRIFT

HON. NEWTON I. STEERS, JR.

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. STEERS. Mr. Speaker, appearing in the Washington Post on February 26, 1978 was Joseph Kraft's article entitled, "Democrats: Mastery Yields To Drift." It was clear to me that Mr. Kraft attempted to use the incident between you and Congressman CAPUTO as an example of his general theme—the decline of authority in Government. I therefore, responded to the editor of the Washington Post with the following letter:

MARCH 1, 1978.

The EDITOR,
The Washington Post,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR SIR: Joe Kraft's column of February 26, 1978 contained as usual some very cogent analysis. However, I believe Mr. Kraft is in error when he says "But when the one true heavyweight in town feels obliged to back down, it is an index of how little clout the administration has in both the country and tho Congress".

I feel that Speaker O'Neill's apology in no way indicates lack of clout; to the contrary, it was, I believe, an indication that the Speaker's largeness of spirit had overcome his hastiness in accusing Bruce Caputo. As one who criticized the Speaker, at the time, I believe the Speaker, by his apology, added to his stature.

Sincerely,

NEWTON I. STEERS, Jr.●

THE UNITED NATIONS AND A MID-EAST SETTLEMENT

HON. STEPHEN J. SOLARZ

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. SOLARZ. Mr. Speaker, United Nations delegates have realized that their condemnations of Israel contribute nothing to a resolution of conflicts in the Middle East. Those nations which continue their attacks on the Jewish state are being excluded from a meaningful role in peace negotiations. Humorist Joey Adams, in an editorial printed in the Manhattan weekly, Our Town, makes these observations in a satirical critique of this international forum. Echoing the sentiments of all people committed to a viable Middle East peace settlement, Mr. Adams writes that the U.N. "* * * should encourage potentially moderate Arab States to follow Egypt's lead leaving the radicals with the choice of moderation or isolation." It is my hope that the United Nations will soon begin contributing to a reduction of hostilities in the Middle East, and throughout the world. I respectfully submit the editorial written by Mr. Adams:

From: Joey Adams
To: The U.N.—Useless Nations Organization
Subject: An open letter

DEAR USELESS: Goliath tried to deny the right of the tribes of Israel to live. Then Hitler tried to deny the right of the Jewish people to live. For 30 years the Arabs have tried to deny the right of the Jewish state to live. And now that we've got Egypt and Israel together, the giant against us is the United Nations.

Begin and Sadat are meeting face to face—but the United Nations is censuring Israel. For the first time in 30 years there's a prayer of peace in the Middle East—but the United Nations is censuring Israel. Israel is attacked on the day of Yom Kippur when its citizens are praying in the synagogue and the United Nations brands Israel the aggressor. With what were they aggressors? Could they shoot with their Bibles? Did they have ammunition in their prayer shawls? But the United Nations censured Israel!

What are these guys doing over there on the East River? What do they do here in our town anyway? Besides freeloading at every cocktail party, parking illegally at every fire hydrant between here and downtown Newark and eating up the city's money in protection and free services, what is it these bums do besides censure Israel?

Only recently people everywhere were looking to Jerusalem and Cairo for the maiden voyage of the Dove of Peace. It was the first flutter of hope out of the Middle East in three decades. We saw Sadat lean over to kiss Golda. We saw Israelis wave Egyptian flags. We saw thousands of muslims welcome back their leader after a journey no one would have dreamt possible days before.

Meanwhile, the anachronistic Useless Nations creaked along its archaic way seeing nothing, hearing nothing and solving nothing. On November 25, five days after the Sadat visit, the U.N. General Assembly overwhelmingly passed yet another anti-Israel resolution. This time they condemned Israel for occupying Arab lands.

The U.N. is getting senile in its old age. It promotes anti-democratic ideas to weaken Western civilization. It tries to undermine the legitimacy of the only democratic state in the Middle East which also happens to be the strategic ally of the symbol of Western civilization, the United States. It abets bigots the world over and particularly in the Soviet Union by its passage of the 1975 Zionism-isracim resolution which serves as a justification for anti-Semitism.

The time has come for the U.N. to put up or shut up shop forever. Their purpose in case they forgot is to engender peace not war. When will such an olive branch, such an opportunity for peace present itself again? May this not be a beginning for all humanity to follow? Isn't this the reason for the U.N.?

To justify its existence the U.N. should encourage contacts between Israelis and Arabs on all levels—governmental, economic, cultural. It should encourage potentially moderate Arab states to follow Egypt's lead leaving the radicals with the choice of moderation or isolation. Above all, it must stop pandering to the terrorist organizations which hijack planes, which murder Olympic athletes, which bomb innocent women and children in supermarkets and which rule out the possibility of peace as long as Israel exists.

Israel asks only the right to live. How can mankind support an international organization of people who won't recognize that? Aren't six million Jews who were put in ovens enough?

Today it may be the Jews who are being pushed into the sea. Tomorrow it could be the Catholics or the blacks or even the Baptists.

Et tu, U.N.? The Jews have been pushed out of every corner of the world. They've been attacked, persecuted, burned and killed in Poland, Bulgaria, Russia, Rumania, Hungary, Germany and points East and West. It took 5,000 years but they have a country of their own. They paid for it with their money as well as their lives—and you want to take it away from them? Well, you can't do it. You can not trade Jewish blood for Arab oil.

Now is the time for this kept mistress of the world to show she hasn't outlived her usefulness. Now is the time for the U.N. to rise up and speak for reason, compromise and moderation. Now is the time for the U.N. to show if it's worth a damn. Okay, you dragged your feet on censuring hijacking but you were quick to censure Israel. Okay, you dragged your feet in praising Sadat but you were quick to protect the rights of the Palestinians. Okay . . . but now . . . now . . . stand up before it's too late.

But with or without this international Tinker Toy on the East River, let US back President Sadat and Prime Minister Begin in their bid for peace. If we are supportive rather than negative, if we give them our blessing rather than our hating—who knows, with Isaiah we, too, might see the day when, "The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb—and the leopard shall lie down with the kid—and the calf and the young lion and fatling together." ●

A NEW KIND OF NAVY

HON. PATRICIA SCHROEDER

OF COLORADO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, our Navy needs some creative thinking. Like most institutions the Navy has become wedded to old concepts and patterned ways of thinking. In the January issue of the Proceedings of the United States Naval Institute I was pleased to find some innovative thinking by Commander Timothy J. Keen, U.S. Navy (Retired) in his article "A New Kind of Navy." Commander Keen raises some very basic questions about the continuation of the large deck carrier as the centerpiece of our fleet and the Navy's power projection role. I commend the Commander's article to my colleagues.

"A NEW KIND OF NAVY"

(By Cmdr. Timothy J. Keen)

The Missions of the Navy.—The missions are strategic deterrence, projection of power ashore, sea control, and naval presence. The top priority mission, strategic deterrence, assures a second-strike capability through credible strategic weapon systems at sea. Our ability to make devastating counter-strike against any power which might attack the United States gives us and the world some assurance that no nuclear war will occur. At the other extreme, naval presence implies no more than a show of naval force in any part of the world where it can be of constructive influence in the light of U.S. national policy. Naval presence is accomplished with relative ease if warships are available in adequate numbers and capabilities to provide for projection of power ashore and sea control.

To consider the in-between missions, projection implies the deliberate application of military force against an enemy, usually ashore. This can be accomplished through the delivery of ordinance by aircraft, shore bombardment by naval guns, or amphibious assault. The main thrust of such power projection is vested in carrier aviation. The carrier task force, with its potential for high-volume and far-ranging delivery of ordinance, has been the mainstay of the U.S. surface fleet since World War II. In the shadow of naval air, naval gunnery has struggled for notice and support with little success.

Power projection has preoccupied our thinking and planning since World War II. The naval heroes of our time, and those who have inherited the top leadership of the Navy, made their marks in the power projection field. Attacking the enemy with force and vigor, using the latest aircraft and combatant ships, is the career motivation of the profession. It has been the obvious avenue to promotion, and it offers "challenge" in the ultimate sense. Power projection is what most career officers have been trained to accomplish, and it is the professional area in which they believe their vocation is most likely to find fulfillment in terms of status and compensation. With this set of circumstances, it is understandable that naval planning might be strongly oriented to "power projection" capability.

Who among our contemporary naval leaders is likely to crusade for sea control forces if such an action may imply trading off carriers, attack aircraft, and cruisers? What is the incentive to provide more resources for convoy escort, antisubmarine warfare, minesweeping, patrol craft, and means for giving cargo ships meaningful defense systems? Who is likely to conclude that power projection should be secondary to sea control?

However, if we are not balanced in our thinking about future requirements, how serious might this be in distorting our naval posture? Beyond 1980, it appears sea control will very likely be the prime naval mission in nonnuclear war. Admiral Stansfield Turner writes that ". . . we must approach the use of the term 'Sea Control' from two directions: denying an enemy the right to use some seas at some times; and asserting our own right to use some seas at some times."[1] Admiral Turner points out that it is no longer conceivable, except in the most limited sense, to control the seas totally for one's own use or to deny them totally to an enemy. Party of the reason for narrowing the meaning of the term "sea control" is expansion of the potential naval threat. In addition to large numbers of torpedo-firing submarines, our presumed enemy has developed long-range aircraft which can launch antiship missiles at ranges beyond practical antiaircraft interception. The Soviet Union has also equipped a growing number of ships with surface-to-surface missiles of varying ranges and capabilities. Further, many of its submarines are equipped with antiship cruise missiles, some of which can be fired while the submarine is completely submerged.

These new attack dimensions require far more than systematic attrition of submarines as a means of asserting safe passage via the sea lines of communication. The oceans are becoming subject to guerrilla warfare of sophisticated character.[2] Antisubmarine warfare is not enough to protect friendly shipping. A protecting force must also be able to deal with a variety of antiship missiles. Since antimissile defense is extremely difficult, and because the sea lines of communication are prerequisites to projection of power ashore, it appears that first priority in allocation of resources may have to shift to sea control.

While the defense or assurance of sea lines of communication is an awesome challenge, with tens of thousands of miles of heavily traveled routes to protect and ever-increasing dependence of industralized countries on massive quantities of minerals and oil, the U.S. Navy does not seem to be addressing the issue. Insofar as a threat from the Soviet Union is concerned, the problem may be an unlikely one. Détente may keep us from serious confrontations, nation to nation, at that level. However, even without a war between the superpowers, we are becoming increasingly vulnerable to extortion by many other nations which can acquire weapons of exceptional capability. The U.S. Navy has an obligation to develop, organize, and deploy forces which can guarantee reasonable security of worldwide ocean traffic regardless of the Soviets. The need dictates many escorts capable in several dimensions of warfare; more complete use of advanced military technology; and a new world of operational integration between surface ships, aircraft, and submarines.

The Role of Naval Aviation.—In contrast to the sea control problem, consider current planning for naval forces. The U.S. Navy now has the makings of a dozen or so carrier task forces. We have invested our "Sunday punch" in the aircraft carrier and her covey of planes. This has provided tremendous offensive strike power and a source of international influence for decades. However, before we overextend our confidence in these carrier task forces, the future of manned aircraft as instruments of warfare should be analyzed. Our large aircraft carriers may go the way of the battleship.

[2] As used here, "guerrilla warfare" means a type which employs a variety of attack modes, unorthodox hostile actions, undeclared war, outrageous methods, etc.

Why might this unthinkable situation come about? Aviation, as an instrument of warfare, probably had its origin in the balloons of the 19th century. The ability to have a man aloft as an observer was exploited successfully on several occasions. Following the invention of the propeller-driven aircraft, aerial observers in World War I achieved even greater efficacy, and it was inevitably discovered that aircraft could be used for dropping explosives beyond the range of guns. When this practice began, it became necessary to apply other aircraft to intercept enemy aircraft which might drop bombs. The technology and the glamour associated with military aviation blossomed. Aircraft carriers appeared on the seas in the 1920's, and World War II found the carrier aircraft a well-developed machine with a capability for remote delivery of weapons with considerable accuracy. The Pearl Harbor attack was a spectacular demonstration of this progress. Without doubt, the war was dominated by aircraft, especially in the Pacific. A few years later, our air technology was effectively applied in Korea in close support of our troops.

Similarly, attack aircraft, both carrier-borne and land-based, figured heavily in the Southeast Asia operations during the late 1960s. However, by 1970, a serious new problem was recognized in offensive air operations. Aircraft were increasingly threatened by advancing capability in antiair weapon systems. It took extraordinary effort to reduce aircraft losses from these causes to an acceptable level in Southeast Asia. Elaborate suppression tactics and countermeasures had to be developed to permit aircraft penetration for the dropping of conventional ordnance. This situation did much to spur the standoff air-launched weapons which were used with increasing success in the late stages of the Vietnam War.

In 1973, when the Arabs and the Israelis fought one another, the antiair defenses of the Suez were dense and effective. This experience added emphasis to the current development of standoff weapons, remotely piloted vehicles, and other mechanisms for improving the safety of flight in a combat zone.

While we have yet to gain experience in attacking modern warships with manned aircraft, it seems likely that comparable developments in antiaircraft systems afloat have made overflight unacceptable. "Iron bombs" are thus obsolete in all types of air warfare except against target areas with little or no defense. Standoff weapons are current, practical, and essential. This changes the role of the fighter-interceptor pilot a great deal. No longer can he loiter in the vicinity of a protected force and dash out on any radial to meet intruders. Enemy aircraft will "stop" several hundred miles short of a defended point and launch weapons. If an interceptor is going to do anything about it, he must travel hundreds of miles to attack the bomber, its approach having been detected even more hundreds of miles beyond, or he must intercept the weapons as they approach the defended point. Since the missiles are small, fast, very high or very low, numerous, and likely to come on a coordinated basis from many directions and platforms, it does not appear that airborne fighter aircraft can provide adequate defense. A carrier force will not be able to maintain enough interceptors in the air to provide meaningful cover and still conduct strike operations.

Thus, as our primary naval investment, we have aircraft carriers to provide platforms from which attack aircraft can carry ordnance to targets. We have fighters on board the carriers to protect these ships from counter-destruction. We have large numbers of combatant and logistic ships committed to defense and support of the aircraft carrier. In aggregate, we have a huge equity in ships and planes to support a relatively small number of attack aircraft. If this is the best way to invest our resources, we are still on the right course. However, it appears that within a few years, the attack aircraft will not be able to carry ordnance very near to a target, perhaps only halfway, launching "smart weapons to proceed the remainder of the distance. If it comes to pass that conveyor aircraft of the future cannot approach closely to target areas, then we should assess the merit of having the weapons carried halfway when technology permits missiles that can fly all the way without the benefit of launching aircraft.

To put the situation in another perspective, it might be well to consider how carrier aviation came to be so important and attractive in the first place. In the early days of this century, aircraft operations were severely limited in many respects. The payload was small, the range was short, navigation was rudimentary, and communications in any form were lacking. This more or less dictated that air operations had to take place in the proximity of an airfield. The aircraft carrier emerged as a portable airfield so that air operations could be moved to the open sea or, later, across the sea to an enemy. This was a great military innovation. Over the past 50 years, however, huge improvements have been made in aircraft speed, altitude, range, payload, navigation, communications, control, defense, etc. Aircraft can now operate at great ranges from their home bases and with considerable efficacy. The Soviet "Bear" aircraft covers the entire Atlantic Ocean. U.S. B–52, P–3s, 747s, and many other aircraft can fly great distances and deliver large payloads. So it is no longer essential that an airport be moved to within a few hundred miles of an objective in order to operate aircraft against it. The Soviets know this. Their naval aviation is almost entirely land-based.

If this hypothesis is valid and we forgo the requirement for attack aircraft to lift weapons to altitude for launching, we can eliminate the need for the aircraft carrier in the present form. We can eliminate the fighter-interceptor aircraft needed to protect the carrier We can dismiss the defending surface antiair warfare ships and the logistic train associated with air operations. What we can have, instead, are other types of strike ships, presumably less expensive, more easily supported, and less readily targeted by enemies. New classes of surface ships can be the Navy attack weapons of the future, carrying a variety of surface-launched missiles instead of manned aircraft.

Coupled with the likely decline of carrier-launched aircraft as the cutting edge of U.S. naval power is the increasing vulnerability of the carrier herself. Ocean surveillance by all major powers is approaching a fine art. It seems safe to say that an aircraft carrier can be targeted by a sophisticated enemy at all times regardless of preventive measures designed either to quiet the carrier or hide her. With only 13 U.S. carriers available, the problem of enemy targeting is far too simple. The physical size of these massive ships also eases the problem of target discrimination by long-range weapons. While carriers have a high degree of survivability, the nature of their payload and the intricacy of their operations diminish the likelihood of effective performance after one or more hits by contemporary high-explosive warheads. Their flight decks and hangar decks are jammed with a dangerous array of metals, liquids, and explosives. A modern aircraft carrier may be able to take several missile hits without sinking, but the chances of continuing operations on a given mission are small. Occasional catastrophic flight deck accidents have conveyed this message without the reality of wartime attacks.

A disturbing aspect of this operational vulnerability is the size of the force which exists for the sole purpose of protecting the carrier. If the carrier is out of action, for whatever reason. the entire entourage of defensive and supporting ships has minimal useful function; the whole task force might well retire and avoid danger. Without the carrier, the force has no value as a projection-of-power instrument.

With the advent of technology to support production and deployment of longer-range, surface- or submarine-launched cruise missiles, an obvious alternative is development of a force of lesser ships with aggregate offensive strike power comparable to the striking force of a carrier's attack aircraft. Such a force would suffer only incremental degradation of capability with the loss of an individual ship and would avoid the tactical handicap of total dependence on the functioning of any one ship. The targeting problem for an enemy would be multiplied in proportion to the number of ships over which the offensive capability was divided. The logistic picture, certainly, should be simplified by the elimination of requirements for large quantities of JP–5 fuel, and the complexity and expense of aircraft support would be relieved. There would also emerge an element of enemy uncertainly in ship-launch versus air-launch threat in that a ship might launch at any time, whereas air-launch is possible only when an aircraft is airborne.

To suggest that the time-honored mission of the naval aviator is in decline is to invite strong reaction from dedicated aviation professionals. Considering the enormity of our national investment in military aviation, the notion that we may no longer need it is certainly hard to accept.

Surface Warship Concepts.—History has many examples of major changes in naval warship design technology which were contentious. The shift from sail to steam was marked by years of professional controversy, and the screw propeller was a difficult innovation. The Navy is a high-inertia institution when it comes to basic changes in the way ships are built. At the risk of provoking surface naval officers whose professional ideals are represented in sleek, heavily armed warships steaming at more than 30 knots, another disrupting thesis is proposed.

In order to achieve a surface fleet in the numbers that will be required for sea control missions of the future, the cost of each new ship must be reasonable. We may have to go for quantity rather than quality. However, there is at least one major cost factor currently associated with quality which may not be worth the price. The maximum speed requirement for a surface combatant is worth examining.

Warships have always been designed to achieve the "best speed" practical for their size and purpose. When the steam turbine made its debut in naval ship construction, ship speeds quickly advanced to take advantage of this power package. The destroyers of World War I were capable of 35 knots, and in later years, the Italians built a destroyer that was capable of more than 40 knots. However, it was eventually determined by designers that 30 knots or thereabouts is a practical maximum for a warship. This is generally close to the limiting ratio between speed and the square root of length. Above this design factor, the penalty is too great in terms of power plant and fuel consumption. That is not to say that 30 knots come easily, but that speed has been an acceptable compromise for almost 50 years.

Naval aviation long ago adopted the 30-knot ship speed as a threshold factor in aircraft design. Because aircraft launch concepts were initially scaled to depend on 30 knots of wind, it became necessary that aircraft carriers be capable of 30 knots and that all associated ships likewise perform at 30 knots or better. Now, this speed level is the criterion for whether or not a ship is called "carrier capable." It is a measure of ship value in a carrier-task-force-oriented Navy.

Aside from the ability to run with a carrier, 30-knot speed is not a critically important feature of a warship in 1978. Weapon technology has long since wiped out the advantage of a few extra knots in a naval engagement. When ship-launched cruise missiles with 300-mile range arrive in the arsenal, it will take an entire day to make any difference in range with a speed advantage of 10 knots.

It also used to be that naval forces could essentially run away from submarines if they could operate at 30 knots. This is no longer true. Submarines can now exceed this speed, and target speed is essentially immaterial to torpedo fire control. Further, antisubmarine measures are severely degraded by high speed because of sensor interference.

The primary benefit which continues to be attached to warship speed is the ability to change location with greater rapidity and thereby to increase the strategic leverage of the force. Speed differential in the range of 20 to 30 knots has diminishing application to tactical effectiveness once a battle develops. However, even though speed may not buy as much as it used to, why worry about it if you can have 30 knots? As long as there is some merit in fast transit, should we not continue to strive for it? The answer depends on willingness to accept the penalties which go with high speed in ship design. Some of the factors are as follows:

For displacement-type hull designs, maximum efficient speed is essentially determined by the ratio of speed to the square root of the length. With the speed in knots and the length in feet, the practical limit is about 1.3.[3] To remain in a reasonable power situation, the hull must be longer with increasing speed.

If we are seeking a warship of relatively modest length and insist on more than 30 knots, she will demand a very powerful propulsion plant. If we concurrently require that the ship be heavily armed and have good range, we create a difficult design and construction challenge. The cost of construction is driven up because everything must be "fitted" as in a puzzle. The cost advantages of prefabrication modularity and the extra space and weight which are associated with modularity must be sacrificed in the interest of compactness, lightness, and weight distribution. The whole process becomes very complex and labor intensive. The ship costs many times more than a merchant ship of similar displacement, and she takes two or three times longer to construct.

While longer hulls can achieve higher speeds within the 1.3 ratio, insistence on 30 knots does drive up the cost because of proportional increases in shaft horsepower and the overall high-performance character of the ship. Furthermore, it is almost inescapable that a large, high-performance warship would be loaded with a large, high-performance combat system. This would negate the opportunity for low dollar cost per ship and high endurance. Our experience leads us to scale combat power to hull size when we think of combatant ships. A 50,000-ton ship with the armament of a 4,500-ton guided-missile destroyer seems ludicrous. It appears that we are driven to high prices in combatant ships by insistence on both high speed and high density of equipment. The result is a very high cost per ton, dense manning, and limited capacity for sustained operations without regular transfusions of food, fuel, and ammunition.

The obvious alternatives are to demand less performance in the traditionally sized surface combatants, or to put the same level of combat performance on much larger ships.

A New Kind of Navy.—Having predicted a declining future for carrier aviation as the centerpiece of U. S. naval power and criticized one of the most attractive features of the contemporary surface warship, positive suggestions are in order. If there is real need for surface combatants in the decades ahead, what shoud they be like? A desirable ship to cope with the sea control problems of the 1980's should be:

Able to steam 20,000 miles or more without refueling. This comes automatically with a nuclear-powered ship, but the range can be available in other types of ships.

Able to carry enough ordnance to preclude the necessity for underway rearming or even advanced base rearming in a "short war."

Sufficiently armored or bulky to protect vital systems and to enable the ships to maintain usable combat portential after being hit.

Cost-effective and flexible in mission potential, even though this might operate against peak performance in any particular role.

Air capable to a significant degre. The aircraft need not be high performance in the sense of speed and maneuverability, but they should have respectable payload, endurance, and the ability to operate without close control.

Able to carry a full complement of weapons. She has to be capable of operating in a severe air attack environment, coping with antiship missiles on a high-density, quick-reaction basis, and she should have antisubmarine warfare capability for self-defense and for protection of accompanying forces.

Capable of integrated operations with command and surveillance systems at other locations and have capacity to operate effectively with aircraft and submarines.

Roomy in that she provides adequate crew comfort over sustained periods at sea.

All of the foregoing would require a very large ship compared to the fleet escorts of today. If we insist on nuclear power and high speed, she would also be prohibitively expensive. However, the ship can be both large and inexpensive compared to current estimates for a nuclear-powered strike cruiser or even a highly complex destroyer.

Table 1 compares some of the characteristics of the proposed nuclear-powered strike cruiser, the proposed Aegis-equipped guided-missile destroyer (DDG–47), and the Tarawa-class (LHA–1) amphibious assault ships now in commission and under construction. While the LHA does not match all of the requirements cited for the "ideal" sea control combantant, she does have the basic attributes —of size, endurance, and air capability. She also brings the bonus features of Marine assault capability, since she can carry both troops and ship-to-shore vehicles. The LHA is large enough to accommodate almost any weapon suite which might be proposed with minor concern for weight or moment limits.

The LHA suggests a class of U.S. Navy ships somewhat comparable to the Soviet Moskva and Kiev "antisubmarine cruisers." These new Soviet designs are well armed with anti-air and antiship weapons, and they carry respectable complements of V/STOL (vertical/short takeoff and landing) aircraft. The aircraft flown from their decks are not attack aircraft as favored by the U.S. Navy, nor are they fighter aircraft in a class with the F–14 Tomcat. The Soviets seem to have concluded that they have no requirement for carrier-based fighters and attack bombers as we know them. We might wonder why.

In the geopolitical prospects for the next two decades, our requirements forecasters see new kinds of naval operations described by such terms as marine security, confrontation, interposition, constraint, crisis control, civil evacuation, occupation, interdiction, protection, and the like. Most of these suggest operations of a nonviolent nature backed up by force. They do not seem to be solvable by concentrated "strike operations" of the type in which a contemporary carrier task force specializes. One can envision these future situations being handled by helicopters, boats, vehicles, Seabees, Marines, and military tools other than explosive ordnance. While strike potential may be the essential backup, the orderly application of people and vehicles seems to be the way many of the jobs will be done.

A ship such as the new LHA offers exceptional potential for crisis control and all of the aforementioned types of operations. The LHA is big; she is relatively inexpensive (compared to an attack carrier or a strike cruiser) she can handle helicopters, motor vehicles, amphibious vehicles, Marines, great quantities of military cargo; and she has staying power. The LHA also features a 300-bed hospital and advanced communications. With a moderate increase in cost, the ship could also be armed with the Aegis antiair warfare system, roll-on/roll-off, surface-to-surface missiles, and respectable point-defense systems, thus becoming a dreadnought with respect to offensive and defensive fighting abilities. A gas turbine propulsion plant could make the entire fuel load of this ship usable for either air or ship operations. Finally, again on the theme of flexibility, the helicopter capability of the LHA could support antisubmarine operations and minesweeping. LHAs, with the addition of powerful weapon systems, would give the Navy broad capability to cope with the nonstandard kinds of naval operations which have been forecast for 1980 and beyond—crisis damping, evacuation, interposition, disaster support, etc.

The LHA has been accorded special treatment here because she is an actual ship already and thus provides a basis for practical speculation. However, the possibilities for less expensive ships are almost unlimited if the speed requirement can be scaled down and if the density of the combat payload is kept reasonable. Large, slow hulls are not expensive by Navy ship standards. A 15,000-ton roll-on/roll-off cargo ship can be had for $25 million, a 300,000-deadweight-ton tanker for about $35 million, or a 250,000-deadweight-ton tanker for about $100 million.

The June 1976 issue of the Proceedings contains a description of the remarkable SL–7 container ship—946 feet long, 51,000 tons displacement, and capable of 33 knots. With this great length, the SL–7s operate efficiently with 120,000 shaft horsepower, little more than half the power of a Midway-class (CV–41) carrier of comparable length, and with only two boilers and two shafts as compared to 12 boilers and four shafts in the Midway.

While these are not warships by traditional standards, they are huge oceangoing platforms. They are seaworthy and have great range and vast space and weight capacity for payloads which could include adequate sensors, weapons, and protection systems. The Navy could have 30–40 15,000-ton roll-on/roll-off-type hulls for $1 billion, and they could be equipped with respectable roll-on/roll-off combat systems. The point is that substantially larger hulls can reduce the acquisition cost of a warship if the payload stays constant and reduced maximum speed is accepted. Roominess can allow extensive prefabrication of payload modules, and the modules themselves can be spacious and heavy to ease the problems of equipment installation. With this approach, we could think of major warships—with high level of combat capability and endurance—at costs around $200 million each.

Conclusion.—To the extent that our current and future military requirements differ from those of World War II and the Korean War, so should our Navy. There are probably old things we can do without in terms of equipment and capabilities, and there are undoubtedly new things which we absolutely must acquire. With the constraints of the budget and our manpower, we must look critically at the traditional assets and approach our new acquisitions with imagination. Technology is our national trump suit and truly the "cutting edge" of our armed forces. Dr. Malcolm Currie, former Director of Defense Research and Engineering, has said:

If there is any single dominating trend in weaponry, it is for missiles of all kinds to become more accurate and more destructive. I believe this trend will continue. Missiles and precision guided munitions will continue to transform the nature of warfare by making the precision application of force at a distance a reality. . . . The surface Navy, dominated by the $2B carrier and projected as such into the 21st century, might be changed drastically . . . I think it will be. Air to air combat is now close to the limits of physiological endurance. I believe that new forms of weapons will replace the large battle tank, the supercarrier, and the all-mission manned aircraft sooner or later, and we must be ready with concepts and technologies that will force obsolescence in areas where the Soviets have vast investments in numbers. Our eventual survival may depend on our willingness and ability to do this.

This suggests the need for a searching look at the ships and aircraft which now form the centerpiece of our fleet. The guided missile has already supplanted the bomber, changed the whole character of antisubmarine warfare, and given almost unlimited strike potential to the surface combatant. Our future Navy, which must be planted now, should recognize these realities.●

PLEASANT RIDGE CELEBRATES ITS FIFTIETH

HON. JAMES J. BLANCHARD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. BLANCHARD. Mr. Speaker, the city of Pleasant Ridge, Mich., marked its 50th anniversary yesterday, April 2. Since Congress was not in session Sunday, I want to take the opportunity today to note this special occasion and would like to include a brief history of the city in the RECORD.

Pleasant Ridge is a unique city. It is the smallest incorporated city in Michigan, encompassing only .58 of a square mile. The first subdivision was platted in 1906 and the community began its development in about 1908 with the subdivision of 12 lots along Ridge Road. The development of Pleasant Ridge continued at a steady pace for the next 20 years, with new subdivisions opening up periodically. In 1919, it became a village with Mr. Charles Staff as president.

In 1921 a move to consolidate with neighboring Ferndale and Royal Oak failed. By 1927 the population had increased to 2,289, and permission was sought from the county supervisors to incorporate as a city. Permission was granted, and the measure was put to a vote and passed by a large majority, 173–30. On April 2, 1928, the city charter was approved. Robert H. Crooker was elected as the first mayor, with Harry D. Chapman, Gale L. Wessinger, Neil I. McArthur, and James H. Lobban serving as city commissioners. A butcher shop on Woodward Avenue was converted for use as the first city hall.

The first school in Pleasant Ridge was started before village status was obtained, with money raised by the Pleasant Ridge Club. It was held in Mr. Bourne's chicken coop at 8 Ridge Road but was soon moved to the site of Roosevelt School. In 1921 this school was also outgrown and the present Roosevelt School built. Many of today's residents of Pleasant Ridge attended Roosevelt School, myself included.

Since World War II, Pleasant Ridge's growth has been relatively small, with the 1970 Federal census listing 3,991 residents. The city's first community center was opened in 1946 at 4 Ridge Road and in 1961 a new building was erected to house it. Also in 1961, the city offices moved into a new municipal building.

The city retains the commission-manager form of government of its original charter. Its governing body is composed of a mayor and four city commissioners. The city commission appoints the city manager, clerk, treasurer, assessor, attorney, and the members of the city planning and the city recreation commissions.

As Pleasant Ridge celebrates its 50th birthday, its elected and appointed officials included: Mayor John E. S. Scott; City Commissioners Charles Fillmore, Richard G. Perkins, Francis M. Coffey, and David B. Whyte; City Manager Louis Barry; City Clerk Anne Barnard; City Attorney Donald H. Gillis; Chief of Police Owen W. Parent; and Building Inspector Ernest J. Dellar.

Although Pleasant Ridge is a small city, it provides a broad range of services to its citizens. For example, its recreation facilities for residents of all ages are unequaled in any other city of comparable size.

As a resident of Pleasant Ridge, I know that the community truly lives up to its name. The many fine old homes and lovely tree-lined streets present a peaceful and friendly environment that is enjoyed by all its residents. The city and the residents of Pleasant Ridge, working together, have done an excellent job of living up to the vision of the city's founders, who sought to build a pleasant, residential community.

Today, the resident of Pleasant Ridge, new and old, share that same goal. As we look forward to the next 50 years, it is fitting that we pause to celebrate the unique identity of this city. The best way we can express our gratitude for having the opportunity to live in such a wonderful community, is by maintaining its character and preserving its future.●

GRIGORY GOLDSHTEIN, PERSECUTED IN THE SOVIET UNION

HON. MARIO BIAGGI

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. BIAGGI. Mr. Speaker, Grigory Goldshtein, a citizen of the Union of the Soviet Socialist Republics, has been carrying on the battle for freedom and justice in that country in a most personal way. A Jewish physicist who wants to emigrate to Israel, he has been stripped of his right to employment as a result of his application for an exit visa to leave the Soviet Union.

In typical Soviet fashion, his application was denied for knowledge of state secrets. However, unable to obtain any employment because of his "refusenik" status, he is now accused of the Soviet crime of "parasitism," a crime the Soviets use frequently to harass their Jewish citizens who want to emigrate to Israel.

Grigory Goldshtein is being tried in the Soviet Union for this alleged crime. The New York Legal Coalition for Soviet Jewry prepared a brief in his support. It is an outstanding defense of this most persecuted man. I am inserting it at this point in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, so that my colleagues may have the opportunity to read of the continuing problems for Soviet Jews.

The brief follows:

[Union of Soviet Socialist Republics v. Grigory Goldshtein.]

BRIEF IN SUPPORT OF GRIGORY GOLDSHTEIN, WHO HAS BEEN CHARGED WITH THE CRIME OF PARASITISM, A VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 209–1 OF THE SOVIET CRIMINAL CODE.

Submitted by: The New York Legal Coalition for Soviet Jewery, an affiliate of The Greater New York Conference on Soviet Jewry.

Prepared by: Martin Weisfuse of Delson & Gordon; Eric Rayman of Paul, Weiss, Rifkind, Wharton and Garrison.

At the request of: The New York Legal Coalition for Soviet Jewry.

STATEMENT OF FACTS

Grigory Goldshtein, a resident of Georgia, SSR, is a physicist in the Soviet Union and an expert in the field of automation. In 1971 he applied for an exit visa to Israel but was refused on the grounds that he possessed "state secrets." Shortly after his application was made he was fired from his job as laboratory chief of the Mendeleyev Meteorological Institute at Tbilisi. Since then he has not been able to find work. His "refusenik" status has effectively precluded his employment. In August 1977, he was charged with parasitism. If he is convicted, he could be imprisoned for a term of two years.

Point I

Goldshtein has not committed the crime of parasitism under Articles 209 and 209–1 of Soviet Law:

Article 209 of the Soviet Criminal Code makes it a crime to systematically engage in vagrancy or in begging. Article 209–1 makes criminal the "malicious evasion, by a person leading an antisocial form of life," of work assigned by a district executive committee of a soviet of working people's deputies designed to effect the "discontinuance of a parasitic existence."

The crime of "parasitism" has two elements: a) the avoidance of socially useful work, and b) leading an antisocial parasitic way of life. Grigory Goldshtein has consistently been ready, willing and able to perform work as a scientist, his field of endeavor. Because of his refusenik status prospective employers have denied him work. It cannot be said that Grigory Goldshtein is leading a parasitic way of life, notwithstanding the fact that he is through no fault of his own unemployed. While he was working he earned a salary of 400 roubles per month, a sum substantially higher than the average wage in the Soviet Union of 60 roubles per month. Having some money, he has sufficient savings in order to live without being a burden on the State or his family.

Moreover under Articles 3 and 7 of the Soviet Criminal Code the existence of the crime of parasitism must be predicted upon the commission of a socially dangerous act. No such act has been committed by Grigory Goldshtein. His letter of protest to President Nikolai Podgorny over the murder of Israeli athletes in Munich in 1972 certainly cannot be considered socially dangerous. Such atrocities as those in Munich caused universal outcries by all civilized nations and certainly is not inconsistent with Soviet policy. If the indictment is based upon Grigory Goldshtein's desire to practice his religious beliefs and to seek immigration to his homeland, then the application of this statute becomes the vehicle for fostering racism, a doctrine inconsistent with both the new Soviet Constitution and the rights of man. Articles 34 and 36 of the new Soviet Constitution guarantee that Soviet citizens will not be discriminated against on the basis of race or nationality. The systematic discharge from employment, harassment, warrantless searches by the KGB, and this very prosecution are all directed against Jews seeking to practice their religion and emigrate to Israel and attest to racial discrimination against Jews in the Soviet Union in violation of the New Soviet Constitution.

Point II

Invoking Article 209–1 of the Soviet Criminal code (the "anti-parasitism" section) in this case violates the Soviet constitution:

Article 40 of the New Soviet Constitution, ratified in October 1977, guarantees the equal rights to Soviet citizens irrespective of nationality or race. These rights are made meaningless if Grigory Goldshtein can be fired from his job, denied subsequent employment and then punished for "refusing" to work, all as a result of the attempted exercise of rights guaranteed him by a constitution to which the USSR proclaims adherence.

Article 40 of the New Soviet Constitution states that:

Citizens of the U.S.S.R. shall have the right to work, that is, to guaranteed employment and remuneration for this work in accordance with the quantity and quality, including the right to choice of profession, types of occupation and employment in accordance with their vocation, abilities, training, education, and with account of the needs of society.

Grigory Goldshtein is a trained physicist, who formerly worked as laboratory chief of the Mendeleyev Meteorological Institute. He was fired from that job in 1971 when he applied to emigrate. Since that time he has been offered only two types of work by the executive committee of a Soviet of working people's deputies, both of them unacceptable. First the committee offered Goldshtein menial work as a street sweeper. Goldshtein rejected such work as was his right under the New Soviet Constitution which guarantees him "the right to choice of profession . . . in accordance with [his] vocation, abilities, training [and] education." Secondly, the executive committee, knowing Goldshtein's desire to emigrate, offered him work in top secret, scientific research capacities. Were he to accept such a position it would greatly impede his ability to emigrate, thus denying him the "choice of profession" as guaranteed by the New Soviet Constitution, and violating canons of international law (described in Point IV below) to which the Soviet Union subscribes.

The anti-parasitism law punishes the "malicious evasion" of work after a district executive committee orders the performance of work. Grigory Goldshtein has expressed his willingness to work in a suitable capacity, but to date he has been denied all productive jobs solely because of his application to emigrate. The enforcement of the anti-parasite law in this fashion is a violation of the Soviet Constitution and an affront to human dignity.

Point III

Grigory Goldshtein cannot be convicted of violating the anti-parasite laws until an executive committee has assigned him productive work:

One of the procedural aspects of the anti-parasitism law is the requirement that a work shirker be assigned by a local Soviet executive committee productive work at an enterprise situated in the district of his permanent residence or in another locale within that particular region, territory or autonomous republic. There is no criminal liability until the supposed shirker fails to obey the decision of the local Soviet Committee.

The Employment Policy Convention, adopted by the General Conference of the International Labour Organization on July 9, 1964 and effective July 15, 1966, sets forth the labor policy of its member states (including the Soviet Union). Article 1 § 2 states the policy shall aim at ensuring that:

(a) There is work for all who are available and seeking work;

(b) Such work is as productive as possible;

(c) There is freedom of choice of employment and the fullest possible opportunity for each worker to qualify for, and to use his skills and endowments in, a job for which he is well suited, irrespective of race, colour, sex, religion, political opinion, national extraction, or social origin. (Emphasis added.)

The work which has been offered Goldshtein to date has consisted of menial jobs or top-secret jobs. Neither type is a job for which "he is well suited," the former because of his scientific training, and the latter because of his political opinion.

Grigory Goldshtein has not been assigned any appropriate tasks by a local Soviet executive committee. Until such time as he is assigned suitable work, which he thereupon refuses to undertake, he has not transgressed any Soviet laws.

Point IV

Denial of permission to emigrate violates multiple treaties to which the Soviet Union is a signatory:

In international forums officials of the Soviet Union have dismissed allegations that the USSR persecutes its Jewish citizens by claiming that such charges interfere with the internal affairs of a sovereign state. Even a cursory examination, however, of the major international humanitarian accords extending from 1948 through 1975 reveals that the Soviets have been violating not only the canons of morality, but also the international agreements which have been freely negotiated, signed, and ratified by the appropriate organ of Soviet government. The major accords are:

(1) The Helsinki Final Act (1975) (the "Helsinki Accord") which while not technically binding upon its signatories, is a major political agreement widely disseminated in Soviet newspapers.

(2) The U.N. Universal Declaration of Human Rights (1948) (the "Universal Declaration") which was passed by the General Assembly, 58–0. The Soviet Union initially abstained on this vote but agreed to abide by the Universal Declaration in subsequent International Agreements.

(3) The Convention on the Elimination of All Forms of Racial Discrimination (1965) (the "Discrimination Convention") which has the status of a full-fledged, binding international treaty.

(4) The International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (1966) (the "International Covenant") which, upon ratification by a sufficient number of states, recently became binding upon its signatories including the Soviet Union.

A. The Helsinki Accord

In August 1975, the Union of Soviet Socialist Republics, along with 34 other countries, participated in the Conference on Security and Co-Operation in Europe, and signed the Helsinki Accord, thereby endorsing the rights of freedom of conscience and religion.

Principle VII of Section 1 of the Helsinki Accord, dealing with Principles Guiding Relations Between Participating States, sets forth the intention of the signatories to guarantee human rights and fundamental freedoms, including the freedom of thought, conscience, and religion or belief, for all without distinction as to race, sex, language or religion.

The Principle speaks, in paragraph 2, of civil, political, economic, social, cultural, and other rights deriving from the "inherent dignity of the human person" and "essential for his free and full development." In paragraph 4, the Principle speaks of the protection and enjoyment of rights of national minorities, and in paragraph 8, the signatories reaffirm their commitment to the human rights provisions of the major international documents and agreements, including the UN Charter, the Universal Declaration, and the International Covenant. The Soviet Union has recognized or is a party to each of these documents and agreements.

In Section 6 of the Helsinki Accord, the participating signers agreed to "Make it their aim to facilitate freer movement and contacts, individually and collectively, whether privately or officially, among persons. . . ."

B. The Universal Declaration

The USSR has agreed to be bound by the Universal Declaration. Although the Soviet Union initially abstained on this vote, it later agreed to abide by the Declaration by voting affirmatively on the 1965 Discrimination Convention and the 1966 International Covenant. Moreover, the Helsinki Accord reaffirmed the principles of the Universal Declaration and adopted them by reference.

On the right to free movement and emigration, the Universal Declaration in 1948 stated unequivocally:

Everyone has the right to freedom of movement and residence within the borders of each state. Everyone has the right to leave any country, including his own, and to return to his country.

C. The Discrimination Convention

The Discrimination Convention reaffirmed the principle of free movement and emigration in 1965 and the Soviet Union agreed at the time to grant its residents the following rights:

The right to freedom of movement and residence within the borders of each state. The right to leave any country, including one's own, and to return to one's country.

D. The International Covenant

The International Covenant, reaffirmed by reference in the Helsinki Accord, once again bound its signatories to honor the right of free movement across national borders by the signatories' residents. Article 12 ringingly restated the signatories' dedication to the principle of free emigration.

1. Everyone lawfully within the territory of a State shall, within that territory, have the right to liberty of movement and freedom to choose his residence.

2. Everyone shall be free to leave any country, including his own.

3. The above-mentioned rights shall not be subject to any restrictions except those which are provided by law, are necessary to protect national security, public order, public health or morals or the rights and freedoms of others, and are consistent with the other rights recognized in the present Covenant.

4. No one shall be arbitrarily deprived of the right to enter his own country.

The denial of Grigory Goldshtein's petition to emigrate is a flagrant violation of the Helsinski Accord, the Universal Declaration, the Discrimination Convention and the International Covenant. The Soviet Union has pledged itself to uphold the principles set forth in each of the above-named international treaties.

AMENDMENT TO H.R. 7700

HON. PAUL N. McCLOSKEY, JR.

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. McCLOSKEY. Mr. Speaker, I am inserting in the RECORD today an amendment to H.R. 7700 to strike section 12 of the bill.

Section 12 was added during the Committee markup, without testimony or hearings.

It has a serious impact on our maritime policy in that section 12 would:

First. Require the Postal Service to contract with U.S.-flag carriers for the surface transportation of mail unless no U.S. carrier served the route;

Second. Require that the rate charged be no less than the fully distributed costs of common carriers plus a fair and reasonable profit; and Third. Prevent the Postal Service from specifying the size and characteristics of containers to be used on specific routes in their solicitations for bids.

These provisions are ill conceived, unnecessary, anti-competitive and should be deleted from the bill.

The cargo preference provision is a return of the Mail Subsidy Contract system, replaced by ODS in 1936 because it was corrupt, inefficient, and not achieving its goals. It could lead to high costs and poor service because foreign-flag competition and service will be eliminated.

The U.S. Postal Service (USPS) estimates that the increased costs will be a minimum of $1.4 million. They add that true increases cannot be accurately estimated because without foreign-flag competition or effective rate ceilings the U.S. carriers will charge what the traffic will bear.

This $1.4 million estimate is based on the assumption that U.S.-flag rates are 25 percent higher than their foreign competition. However, a recent Postal Service analysis indicated that U.S. carriers receive 31 percent higher rates worldwide and that in the European market, which accounts for 75 percent of the U.S. international surface mail, U.S. carriers receive 43 percent higher rates.

In addition, the Postal Service states that a Cargo Preference provision will result in poor service because:

First. Foreign-flag competition and almost all service on some routes will be eliminated;

Second. There may be periodic disruption of service unless it is mandatory that carriers move mail when tendered; and Third. Some routes have infrequent service by U.S. carriers.

The State Department considers mail Government generated cargo, and therefore, a cargo preference scheme involving mail is not violative of our treaties of friendship, commerce and navigation. However, the governments of Denmark, Greece, the Netherlands, and the United Kingdom have sent an aide memoire to the State Department protesting the measure as "a most undesirable development" which "would encourage other countries to enact similar openly protectionist laws to the obvious detriment of commerce, trade and private citizens * * *". Since that time, the following additional countries have indicated support for the aide memoire: Belgium, Finland, Norway, Sweden, and Italy.

It should be noted that under the present system U.S. carriers carry 62 percent of the mail. This large percentage is a result of the USPS policy of using U.S.-flag vessels and section 901 of the Merchant Marine Act, 1936, which requires at least 50 percent of all Government generated cargo to be carried on U.S. vessels.

With respect to rate standards, the bill provides that any rate charged:

shall not be less than the sum of—

(1) The fully distributed cost of common carriers; and

(2) A fair and reasonable profit.

This provision puts a floor on bids by carriers. It prevents them from bidding below the sum of their fully distributed costs and a fair and reasonable profit. Even if they wanted to forego profit and bid a break-even rate to meet their competition they would be prevented from doing so. As a result this section could allow an operator with very low fully distributed costs to underbid all of his competitors and monopolize the trade. All of these results are contrary to the overall objectives of the legislation and the mandate of the USPS (to provide efficient and low cost mail service).

The USPS states that this provision forces them to move from competitive transportation at agreed-upon rates to regulated transportation at prescribed rates based on industrywide fully distributed costs, regardless of the costs of the individual carrier. And, that no other Government shipper must pay such rates in the name of U.S.-flag preference.

This section also guarantees a profit by requiring a carrier to include a fair and reasonable profit in his bid.

Section 12 also provides that the USPS may not specify the size of containers which may be used in a particular invitation to bid.

When offering section 12, Mr. WILSON stated that the purpose of the restriction was to prevent the USPS from discriminating against a U.S. carrier by specifying a particular size container which he may not have.

The USPS states that such a restriction:

First. Will hinder the transmission of mail to several foreign postal administrations that have prohibited the use of large containers because they are not equipped to receive them;

Second. Contradicts explicit directions in the general policy provision of their basic statute, 39 U.S.C. 101(f), to stress containerized transportation;

Third. Will result in the USPS having to accept and pay for empty space in large containers;

Fourth. Will delay the transportation of mail until sufficient quantities of mail were available to fill large containers;

Fifth. Will result in the abandonment of containers and the return to loose sacks; and Sixth. Will hamper operations at two major exchange offices, New York and Oakland, because they can only efficiently accommodate specific size containers.

Mr. Speaker, in light of these problems, I find it easy to see why the administration opposes section 12 of H.R. 7700, and I hope my colleagues will support my amendment to strike it.

AMENDMENT TO H.R. 7700

AIDE MEMOIRE

The Governments of Denmark, Greece, the Netherlands and the United Kingdom have noted an amendment to the Postal Service Act of 1977 (HR 7700) which provides for United States flag preference for the carriage of United States originating international sea mail. They understand that this amendment is designed to strengthen United States Postal Service regulations which in practice at present allow foreign flag carriers to be selected for the carriage of such mail.

The above mentioned Governments wish to state that their postal authorities do not give preference to their own national flag carriers and that they would consider the strengthening of such preference by the United States as a most undesirable development. Such United States action would encourage other countries to enact similar openly protectionist laws to the obvious detriment of commerce, trade and private citizens, who are best served when the postal authorities are free to use carriers offering the best combination of service and price, irrespective of flag.

The above mentioned Governments therefore request that their strong concern at the amendment be made known in the appropriate quarters in order that it may not become part of any Postal Service Act that is enacted into law.●

SYNTHETIC OIL REPORT

HON. NEWTON I. STEERS, JR.

OF MARYLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. STEERS. Mr. Speaker, as a member of the Ad Hoc Committee on Energy, I support all cost effective efforts for potential energy conservation. I would like to call to the attention of my colleagues a letter I recently received from a constituent indicating his efforts in energy conservation. By employing synthetic oil as the lubricant in his automobile, he has reduced his consumption of oil and in addition, has improved his fuel economy by roughly 15 percent. He further stated, that it was his responsibility as an "independent distributor of AMS/OIL" to inform the public.

Such efforts can reduce our dependence on foreign oil supplies. We therefore, applaud and encourage his efforts and of all Americans who attempt to meet our goals. I am inserting this letter into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as a tribute to such efforts.

TIFFANY ASSOCIATES
Gaithersburg, Md., January 13, 1978.

Congressman NEWT STEERS,
Cannon House Office Building,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN STEERS: As a member of the House Energy Committee you may be interested in the following: By employing synthetic oil and lubricants in my automobiles I both avoid the use of petroleum oil and improve fuel economy by 10–20 percent. Can you imagine the potential for energy conservation if all your constituents similarly contributed?

The synthetic oil (AMS/OIL) I use has a 25,000 mile drain rating. Using petroleum oils, four 5-quart changes at 6,000-mile intervals used to cost me $68.80 every 24,000 miles (Oil: 20 qts at $1.25=$25.00; Filters: 4 at $5.95=$23.80; Labor: 4 changes at $5.00=$20.00). Now, with synthetic oil one installation of 5 qts plus 1 qt at a 12,500-mile filter change costs $47.40 per 25,000 mile period (Oil: 6 qts at $4.25=$25.00; Filters: 2 at $5.95=$11.90; Labor: original oil change and a filter replacement only at 12,500-miles each at $5.00=$10.00). That represents a savings in lubrication costs of $21.40 every 25,000 miles. And, that's not all. The superior anti-friction properties of synthetic oil increases fuel efficiency with reports from 1 to 12 miles per gallon. My own experience has confirmed between 1 and 3 miles per gallon. An increase of 2 miles per gallon on a car averaging 14 miles per gallon with a petroleum oil represents a gas savings of about 15 percent. This car driven 25,000 miles saves (223.2 gal at $.65) $145.08 in gas expenses. ADDED UP: In a 25,000 mile period (roughly one year) the use of synthetic AMS/OIL has conserved 20 quarts of petroleum oil, 223.2 gallons of gas, and saved $166.48.

If any of your constituents would be interested in learning about AMS/OIL synthetic lubricants, I am prepared to provide literature which summarizes the above experience.

Respectfully,

NEDD D. MOCKLER.●

POLICE STATE COMING

HON. JOHN L. BURTON

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. JOHN L. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, the proposed overhaul of the entire Federal system of criminal justice, which is the essence of S. 1437, is nothing less than a frightening and complicated rewrite of nearly all the criminal laws for this country.

Since the 89th Congress, lawmakers have been toying with the idea of restructuring the Criminal Code. A national commission to study the criminal justice system was established during the 89th Congress and by January 1971, that Commission made its report to Congress. Based on the Commission's work, the Senate Judiciary Committee and the Nixon administration developed their own legislative package to reform the code. A modified version of "S. 1" has been reincarnated in the form of S. 1437.

Columnist Charles McCabe, writing for the San Francisco Chronicle's March 9 edition, has written some comments on S. 1437 which I believe merit the attention of my colleagues in Congress:

POLICE STATE COMING?

The name of the measure is S. 1437. It has been passed by the Senate and is now before the appropriate House committee. It is sometimes called "Son of S. 1," the notorious measure containing the Nixon administration's attempted repeal of many of the Bill of Rights provisions. An angry concourse of civil libertarians got this measure killed.

S. 1437 is generally thought to be a better bill than S. 1, but is still far from reassuring to those who feel strongly about civil liberties. The overall purpose of each measure was to recodify all the federal criminal law of the United States. The chief political clout behind the bill comes from its sponsor, Senator Ted Kennedy of Massachusetts.

The bill is a tremendously complex one. Influential newspapers, with the notable exception of the Los Angeles Times, have on the whole supported it. From what I know of it, I am against it for one chief reason.

If enacted, the bill would federalize crime to an extent that would virtually bring a national police into being. This is a facet of the bill that has been too little examined.

From the beginning of our country, the major agent for dealing with crime has been the states. Federal crime has existed in the shadows and on the borders of state enforcement. The new bill changes all that. It would give the federal government power to punish crimes that have never before been within the purview of the federal government.

S. 1437, according to John Quigley, professor of law at Ohio State University, "would give Federal authorities power to punish most blackmail; extortion and bribery offenses committed in the United States, plus a goodly proportion of all robberies.

"It achieves this by liberal use of such jurisdictional handles as employment of the mails or telephone, the crossing of a state line and the affecting of interstate commerce.

"These so-called 'Federal jurisdictional bases' would federalize crime with no real Federal impact—the only Federal connection would be the happenstance that a phone was used in connection with the crime."

Quigley estimates that passage of S. 1437 would likely yield a tenfold increase in the number of crimes the feds could prosecute. This, he adds, would cause the sharpest break in federal-state relations since the days of the New Deal.

Passage of the bill, Quigley argues, "would give rise to a Federal crime bureaucracy of heretofore unthinkable dimensions. More Federal judges, prosecutors and prisons would be needed, and the Federal Bureau of Investigation would grow into a national police force."

The bill is now being studied by the subcommittee on Criminal Justice of the House Judiciary Committee. One of the members of this subcommittee, Representative Elizabeth Holtzman of Brooklyn, is much alarmed by the police state aspects of this bill. She recently told journalist Nat Hentoff:

"It has not been at all widely reported that the bill increases federal jurisdiction over law enforcement to such an enormous extent that we're headed for a national police force if it passes the House, too."

It is generally believed if the bill gets out of the full House Judiciary Committee, and onto the floor, it will pass. Ted Kennedy is twisting all the arms he can find, including the immensely powerful arm of his Massachusetts House colleague, Speaker Tip O'Neill.

What worries me most about the whole thing, almost as much as the police state provisions, is the fact that they have been largely unreported. Conceivably, the national press is bored by the long, long fight to codify criminal law. I should think the boys would get onto this police state thing—big and soon.●

THE IMPORTATION OF ANIMALS: THE UNFORESEEN CONSEQUENCES

HON. G. WILLIAM WHITEHURST

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. WHITEHURST. Mr. Speaker, the following article, by George Laycock, appeared in the April 1978, issue of Sierra, the bulletin of the Sierra Club. It outlines clearly and effectively the problems which are caused by the introduction of nonnative species of plants and animals, and I commend it to the attention of my colleagues.

THE IMPORTATION OF ANIMALS: THE UNFORESEEN CONSEQUENCES

(By George Laycock)

When the rumor first spread that the Ohio Division of Wildlife was experimenting with a new variety of carp in the shallow ponds of the old fish hatchery, my initial impulse was to dismiss it as false. We did not need another carp—after all, the old one promises to last indefinitely.

The century-old story of that original carp's invasion of American waters has become a classic. The carp arrived here welcomed and blessed by all except a few spoilsports who were "against progress." Typical of the supporters' reaction was the excited response of Nevada's first Fish Commissioner, H. G. Parker. In his report to the governor in 1879, Parker made a plea for $1,000. "My first expenditure therefrom will be for the introduction of carp . . . a German fish, and the most delicious of all known fishes." He praised carp in glowing terms as a food fish with no superior and insisted that the people of Nevada would possess a grand luxury once the carp was established. "Carp should be as plentiful to our people as chickens," he said. "One of my greatest aims has been to stock our waters with the best species of carp."

He knew, as did fisheries people across the country at that time, of Rudolph Hessel's recent success in importing a breeding stock of carp from Germany. With the blessing of the federal government, Hessel established the fish in ponds in Boston, then in Washington, D.C. Legislators were excited about the carp. Here was evidence that the politicians in Washington were watching out for the folks back home. Congressmen practically lined up to get their share of young carp to ship back to their own states. Within two years the fish had gone out to 38 states and territories and begun its swift invasion of American waters.

From a carp's viewpoint the whole project was an astounding success. The carp advanced from stream to stream and lake to lake, taking over waters previously occupied by native fish, rooting in the mud, silting spawning waters and, perhaps worst of all, proving soon enough that it lacked great merit either as food or as a sporting fish.

In short, importation of the carp proved to be a disaster of shocking proportions. The action could not be reversed; the carp is so entrenched that even today there is little hope of eradicating it, despite continuing research and management efforts.

I was told by Ohio officials that the new "grass carp," also known as the white amur, could in no way become the problem the old-fashioned carp had proved to be. The grass carp was needed, the story went, to help keep waters free of weeds, and it would do so because of its hearty appetite for vegetable matter. Promises were also made that the white amur, which can weigh as much as 70 pounds, would prove valuable as a sport fish. These were strong inducements; many creatures have been imported with less to recommend them.

There is nothing new about our fondness for non-native species. The earliest settlers to reach these shores brought their favorite domestic plants and animals, and soon wild animals were also imported for release in the New World. Thousands of such introductions have been tried. In this way America adopted the common pigeon, house sparrow, starling and assorted other species completely foreign to New World ecosystems. Not all the imports released in the wild have flourished. To survive, a newly introduced species must find food, shelter and conditions that allow it to rear its young; this entails discovering an unoccupied niche or pushing aside animals already present.

Old lessons seem to be forgotten or ignored, however, and each new generation casts longing glances at foreign creatures on distant shores. In one recent year imported wildlife included 114,446 mammals, 689,404 foreign birds, 2,504,096 reptiles, 583,441 amphibians and 112,291,686 fish, largely for the pet and laboratory trades.

Reasons for our everlasting search for promising exotics are varied. Animals may be introduced because somebody believes they will provide sport for hunters or fishermen. Others are imported because of sentiment. Immigrants from Europe fostered the importation of a long list of familiar songbirds from other lands. Between 1872 and 1874 a group of "acclimatizers" in Cincinnati spent $9000 to import European songbirds at $4.50 a pair, among them skylarks, starlings, European robins, song thrushes, house sparrows, dunnocks, nightingales, blackbirds, siskins, great tits and corn crakes. Yet just half a century earlier John J. Audubon had been astounded at the abundance of beautiful native birds in and around Cincinnati—orioles, cardinals, warblers, and tanagers, and many more. Other acclimatization societies were busy in St. Louis, Portland, Philadelphia and elsewhere.

Exotic species are sometimes introduced for economic reasons. Sugar cane planters in Jamaica and some of the Hawaiian Islands faced an infestation of cane rats. They imported and released a breeding stock of mongooses to eliminate the rats. This in turn created more problems and the planters have yet to control the mongoose population. Similarly, house sparrows were imported, at least in part, in the mistaken belief that they would control insect pests of shade trees.

The quickest way to learn for myself whether or not there was truth in the rumor that grass carp were newly installed at the nearby fish hatchery was to pay it a visit. The manager, working in the ponds with an assistant, told me that they had acquired the new experimental carp from Arkansas (the epicenter of the current American infestation of these fish) and hoped the carp could be used to keep the hatchery ponds free of the algae that choke them through the summer months.

The first grass carp came to the United States from Taiwan in 1963 and were shipped to Auburn University in Alabama. The idea was that they might help control some of the proliferating exotic weeds that infest waters throughout the southeastern states. A later shipment arrived at the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service fisheries research station at Stuttgart, Arkansas. Both federal and state biologists in Arkansas praise the grass carp. The state has stocked it in more than 100 lakes and streams and fish farmers there continue to promote its spread to new waters nationwide.

Concern about the grass carp's effects led to the 1969 Conference on Exotic Fishes and Related Problems conducted in Washington, D.C. by the Sport Fisheries Institute and sponsored by The American Fisheries Society and The American Society of Ichthyologists and Herpetologists. Professionals at that conference begged for serious research on the gass carp before additional stocking was carried out.

That plea, however, has been largely ignored in Arkansas. Grass-carp enthusiasts have also ignored the warnings of biologists that this fish could seriously compete with native species and, if it spreads into northern waters, destroy wild rice crops and bring new hardships to native waterfowl. Other states have heeded the warnings and banned importation of the carp. Among them is Missouri which, because its neighbor is Arkansas, must face the threat of grass carp regardless of its strong feelings against the entire project. Grass carp can already be found in 40 states. Having reassessed its initial flirtation with the grass carp, Ohio soon disposed of its experimental stock and joined the growing list of states banning the fish. Unfortunately, stock is still available, and some pond owners are reportedly purchasing grass carp and freeing them illegally.

Other exotic fishes have also muscled their way into American waters in recent years. Perhaps the most famous of these is Florida's walking catfish. This fish, capable of breathing air, has a choice of locomotion methods. When population pressures or other factors trigger a reaction, the fish climbs out of the water and sets off cross-country, "walking" on its pectoral fins. First released about 1965 by aquarium dealers in southern Florida, it has since infested waters throughout southern and central Florida. Florida fisheries biologists view the walking catfish as a distinct threat to native game fish but no longer hold hope of eradicating it.

Also in Florida, there is persistent concern that the piranha might become established. If this has not already happened, it could occur easily enough in a state where the aquarium industry is a major enterprise. Anyone doubting that piranha might be turned free should consider a case of some months ago in Rocky River near Cleveland, Ohio. Boys fishing that stream caught a piranha that promptly cut one boy's hand severely. A second piranha was then found in the same fishing hole. Although these tropical fish are unlikely to survive northern winters, the episode is a certain indication that an aquarium owner no longer wanted the meat-eating pets but could not face destroying them.

Almost as dreaded are the tiny South American fishes known as candiru. They too could probably establish themselves in southern states. South American natives have a deep fear of these fish, and with good reason. The candiru are small enough to work themselves into the urogenital openings of both men and women bathers. Removing the fish from its victims often requires surgery.

Florida has suffered most from infestations of unwanted exotic species. Scientists point to a long list of established foreign species including the blue talapia, imported in 1961 for weed control and now crowding bass and bluegills out of their native waters. "By the end of this century," predicts Dr. Walter R. Courtenay, zoologist at Florida Atlantic University, "there will be very few native fish left in the fresh waters of southeast Florida. There is just no way we can prevent the exotics from taking over."

Meanwhile experiments continue with introductions of peacock fish, also from South America, which are considered by some to be exciting sport fish. But little is known about the peacock fish's effect on any kind of native fish. Texas is also interested in establishing Nile perch in its large reservoirs where water is warmed by electric power plant effluents. The Nile perch is a predator that can weigh as much as 300 pounds.

Curiously, exotics that are established accidentally may develop their own defenders who stand ready to fight control efforts. For example, the Wild Burro Protection Association acts as advocate for the personable little burros infesting the dry slopes and canyons of Death Valley National Monument in California, the Grand Canyon and other western lands. These descendants of the North African ass have long served as beasts of burden. They found their way into western lands in the company of "single-blanket jackass" prospectors who burdened them with their worldly belongings, including shovels, pans and coffee pots. The old prospectors passed on, leaving their burros to care for themselves, and today the progeny of these burros number 1600 in Death Valley alone.

The burros' impact on the desert ecosystem is substantial. Studies show that those in Death Valley consume in excess of ten tons of forage daily. In addition they dominate desert water holes. Their most obvious victim is the desert bighorn sheep, which has been dwindling in numbers as the burros flourish. The native bighorn may well become extinct in Death Valley unless something is done soon to bring the burros under control.

But bighorn sheep are not the only victims. Forage consumed by the burros is the natural food of seed-eating birds and of rodents on which birds of prey survive. No animal can enter an existing ecosystem without sending ripples throughout that wild community.

Imported goats, too, continue to destroy the vegetation of fragile lands on which they were released. The Sierra Club recently brought a suit against the Hawaii Department of Land and Natural Resources contending that the department's purposeful maintenance of feral goats and sheep on the Island of Hawaii critically threatens the habitat of the Palila, an endangered bird living only on the slopes of Mauna Kea. In one national park on the Big Island, National Park Service employees have been working to bring the goats under control.

Goats are also damaging San Clemente Island, a 21-mile-long piece of federal land off the Southern California coast. These free-roaming goats are descendants of animals released by early explorers or whalers. When the Navy took charge of the island in 1934, there were 30,000 goats there. Recently 6500 goats were rounded up and shipped to the mainlaid, leaving behind another 3000 that had taken refuge in the rocky canyons. The goats continue to destroy the island's endemic plants; scientists believe eight species have already been destroyed and eight more are threatened.

Of the thousands of efforts made to introduce exotic wildlife to new lands, most fail. And of those that establish populations, few species are considered a valuable asset. Even the pheasant and the brown trout have had destructive biological impacts, and the fact that no one measured these impacts, nor any longer can measure them, does not mitigate the damage. Shuffling animals about the earth is risky and often irresponsible. Even the most thorough scientific studies cannot predict with certainty how an animal will adjust to a new environment. A classic example of this occurred when eastern gray squirrels were transplanted from New Jersey to the British Isles. Once they began spreading through English woodlands, the squirrels developed an unexpected eating habit: they learned to eat the bark of valuable cultivated trees, often girdling and killing them. Says a publication of the U.S. Fish and Wildlife Service, "There is some risk with any importation."

The only safe way to approach the whole question of exotics is to leave wild animals where they occur naturally. The next best answer is to control the reshuffling of wildlife through legislation.

IN THE BEGINNING . . .

Ipswich Sparrows nest only on Sable Island, a small low outpost in the Atlantic 100 miles off Nova Scotia. Their estimated breeding population is only 4000 birds. They were first threatened with extinction when rabbits, introduced long ago as a source of food, depleted the island's vegetation. The rabbits were followed by rats, which escaped from a wreck; they too posed a serious problem to the sparrows, but almost exterminated the rabbits. Cats were then introduced; they successfully cleared out the remaining rabbits and all the rats, but they ate sparrows too. So dogs were taken to the island to destroy the cats. This they did, ably assisted by the lighthousekeeper's gun. Will they become feral dogs perhaps? No, as there is nothing to support them—unless they prey on the island's "wild" horses. In spite of everything, the Ipswich sparrow survived.

NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES' MEMORANDUM ON NATIONAL ISSUES

HON. JOHN BRADEMAS

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, April 3, 1978

● Mr. BRADEMAS. Mr. Speaker, on February 24, 1978, a number of the officers and leaders of the National Council of Churches met with President Carter to discuss with him a number of their concerns as Christians and representatives of a major segment of the religious community in the United States.

I insert at this point in the RECORD the text of the "Background Memorandum" prepared by the National Council of Churches for this meeting:

The memorandum follows:

BACKGROUND MEMORANDUM FOR PRESIDENT CARTER REGARDING CONCERNS WHICH OFFICERS AND LEADERS OF THE NATIONAL COUNCIL OF CHURCHES WANT TO DISCUSS WITH HIM AT THEIR MEETING FEBRUARY 24, 1978

Mr. President, we thank you for providing us with an opportunity to discuss with you some of the concerns, which we believe you share, about the life and health of our nation. We wish to assure you that we identify particularly with your statement of purposes for our nation's policy as expressed in your State of the Union Message: To insure economic justice, advance human rights, resolve conflicts without violence, and proclaim our faith in the liberty and dignity of human beings everywhere.

As you know, our religious tradition and our understanding of the Gospel compel us to study, speak out and act on issues which relate to the quality of our national life today and the relations which our nation has with other nations in an increasingly interdependent world. Within the political tradition of our republic, we believe that it is important that there be continuing dialogue between political leaders and those who represent various private associations of citizens and their views regarding national issues. As representatives of a major segment of our nation's religious community, we are grateful, therefore, for the opportunity to share some of our concerns with you and pleased to provide you, in anticipation of our discussion together, the following background information regarding those concerns.

DOMESTIC ISSUES

National urban policy

We are pleased that the Administration is currently reviewing proposals for new initiatives in urban policy. We are mindful of your campaign pledges in this respect.

The religious values which we hold in common speak of justice, human dignity and community. We know that justice is denied where opportunities to work, to grow and to prosper are unavailable. We know that human dignity is threatened where poverty and poor housing prevail. We know that community is impossible to build where fear supplants hope. A bold and compassionate urban policy can help to create new opportunities, protect human dignity and rebuild community in the cities where so many people live. A new commitment to our cities is a requirement of justice.

A new national urban policy is required to revitalize our urban areas as decent places for our people to live and work. We must construct both policy and program to preserve and enhance the social fabric and community life of our cities while at the same time respecting the neighborhoods which are the cornerstone of urban life. This policy, we believe, must include:

1. A national commitment to genuine full employment and special programs to provide jobs to the jobless in depressed urban areas.
2. A reformed national welfare system which assures a decent income for all American families and which lifts the burden of welfare costs from local governments.
3. A renewed national housing policy which seeks to provide decent housing at an affordable cost for poor and moderate-income families.
4. Efforts to promote reinvestment in urban areas through new economic development and financing structures, as well as programs to combat disinvestment and redlining, and to provide incentives for private investment in depressed urban areas.
5. Comprehensive national health insurance.
6. Comprehensive reform of tax laws to establish a just and equitable system of taxation based on the ability to pay.
7. Reformed federal assistance and procurement policies which seek to aid declining urban areas.
8. Recognition of the importance of neighborhoods and community organizations in urban recovery.

We would particularly lift up for your attention the first two items in these policy needs.

FULL EMPLOYMENT

In light of the persistence of high levels of unemployment and the enormous economic, social and human costs involved, we in the religious community believe that a major new commitment of will and resources to achieve genuine full employment is urgently required.

As religious leaders, we enter this debate not as experts or policymakers, but as men and women concerned about the human toll of unemployment in our families and communities. We fear that our nation is becoming apathetic and unconcerned about the human tragedy and enormous waste which result from large-scale joblessness. If our response is indifference and inaction, we have jeopardized far more than a portion of our work force or national product; we have lost a critical measure of social justice and concern for human dignity.

We believe that the inability of our economy to provide sufficient jobs for our people is a serious national failing and requires major action on the part of our leaders. We are particularly concerned that minorities currently experience the highest unemployment rates in thirty years and that minority unemployment has been twice the rate for whites for two decades. The nearly 40% unemployment rate among minority youth, even in the face of declining white youth joblessness, is one of our nation's most serious problems, in our opinion. The human waste and the related problems created by this unemployment can only be compounded in the future when these young people are full adults. This is a hard-core problem in our society which can only be addressed by the government, as it is much too massive to be dealt with successfully by the private sector.

We urge the Administration to seek imaginative and effective ways to harness the idle human potential of the jobless in meeting our enormous needs for more housing, better transportation, energy conservation, improved education and child care and more adequate health care.

It is for this reason that we commend the action of this Administration in its endorsement of the Full Employment and Balanced Growth Act. We in the religious community have been active participants in the effort to promote legislation which seeks to achieve full employment through economic planning, structural reforms and the establishment of genuine employment goals, because we believe that full employment is the first priority of our economic life.

In March of 1976 the Governing Board of the National Council of Churches adopted a "Resolution on Full Employment" which concluded:

Therefore, the Governing Board of the NCC asserts that full employment is an essential element of a more just economic order and that every individual should be guaranteed the right and the opportunity to a job at adequate compensation. We commit ourselves to the task of shaping a national policy of full employment which would provide the hopes for a better and more productive life for ourselves, our families and our neighbors. We call upon the Federal Government to make full employment the nation's number one priority.

As early as 1958 our governing body adopted a Policy Statement which said in part:

The government should give continued consideration to both short-run and long-term measures to restore and maintain employment levels. The government has a responsibility to use, when needed as stabilizers and other aids, the vast resources available in its fiscal, monetary, public works, and other economic powers.

In commending the Administration's endorsement of the Full Employment and Balanced Growth Act, we would note that we expect the government to commit to the implementation of full employment legislation the resources which this bill's enactment would require.

We in the religious community have been and will continue to be active participants in public debate on the question of full employment legislation and we look forward to strong advocacy on the part of the Administration as Congress takes up this question in the very near future.

WELFARE REFORM

We are greatly concerned about the poor, the disadvantaged, the aged, and the children in our society. Religious communities have traditionally been concerned for the dispossessed and the vulnerable, conscious of the hardships that many of our citizens face in meeting their daily needs. We are, therefore, encouraged by the Administration's legislative proposals related to the desperate need for comprehensive welfare reform.

Most Americans would acknowledge that the present welfare system has failed to meet the needs of our people. Benefits are inadequate and inequitably distributed; certain policies and practices encourage the breakup of families; and there are many wage earners who receive little or no assistance even though their wages are too low to provide for their families. Our failure to maintain a policy and an economy in which we as a nation provide jobs for those who can work and an adequate income for those who cannot is being paid for by the human costs of suffering, alienation, the deterioration of family life, drug abuse, alcoholism and other problems.

With these concerns in mind, the Governing Board of the National Council of Churches adopted a Policy Statement "On Guaranteed Income" on February 22, 1968. The Governing Board endorsed the concept and desirability of a guaranteed income, saying that:

Such a program should meet the following criteria:

(1) It should be adequate to maintain health and human decency.

(2) It should be administered so as to maintain health and human decency.

(3) It should be administered so as to adjust benefits to changes in cost of living.

(4) It should be developed in a manner which will respect the freedom of persons to manage their own lives, increase their power to choose their own careers, and enable them to participate in meeting personal and community needs.

(5) It should be designed to afford incentive to productive activity.

(6) It should be designed in such a way that existing socially desirable programs and values are conserved and enhanced.

We recognize that the guaranteed income is not a substitute for programs of full employment and human resource development. It is not a panacea for all the socio-economic problems encountered by the family and the individual in the course of a life cycle. At the same time, we are compelled to acknowledge that our socio-economic system works imperfectly. It is, therefore, the responsibility of society to devise new institutions which more adequately fulfill basic human rights.

While recognizing that a comprehensive change in the welfare system, such as that embodied in the Administration's bill, involves complex technical and administrative issues, we are primarily concerned with those provisions that bear most directly on the human and moral dimensions of the present efforts to reform the welfare system. The proposed Better Jobs and Income Act reflects an awareness of many of these issues. It is particularly commendable that this bill is developed around a central policy of providing jobs for those who can work and assistance for those who cannot, and that it eliminates the features in the current programs which encourage the break-up of marriages and the dissolution of extended family living.

In light of our focus, there are, however, several issues that we would like to raise concerning the proposed welfare reform legislation.

Jobs.—We believe that the jobs and training provided under this bill must be socially useful and that they should provide future employment opportunity so that those on welfare may become full participants in the nation's work force. Some of the provisions of the bill create disincentives for people to take public service jobs rather than private sector jobs, which suggests that the labor of public service workers is somehow inferior. It is also clear that the public service jobs provided in the proposed act are designed only as temporary employment. What is needed, we feel, is the integration of welfare reform with a comprehensive full employment policy that provides jobs for all Americans able and willing to work in both the public and private sectors, doing useful work at decent wages.

Benefits.—We are concerned that the level of benefits for those not expected to work is inadequate. The proposed benefit level of $4,200 for a family of four is less than two-thirds of the poverty level and represents an improvement in benefit levels only in twelve states. While the states are encouraged to supplement the basic federal payment, there is no guarantee that those now receiving adequate benefits will not be hurt. Furthermore, the program is scheduled to begin in 1981 and yet there is no provision for improvement in the initial benefit levels or increases reflecting changes in the cost of living between then and when the bill was introduced in 1977.

Eligibility.—In the past we have opposed efforts to base eligibility for federal programs, such as food stamps, on a measure of a family's past financial situation. We believe that eligibility for assistance should be based on the current needs of the family.

We pledge ourselves to continue to work with the Administration and the Congress on the concerns which we have raised here, and on other issues relevant to welfare reform.

INTERNATIONAL ISSUES

Nuclear disarmament

Seeing strong Presidential leadership in principle on the issues of arms control and disarmament has given us great encouragement.

We commend you for using the symbolic and real power of your office to advance the cause of disarmament.

The member communions of the National Council of Churches have long shared a common call to work for peace with justice through the responsible use of power.

STRATEGIC ARMS LIMITATION TALKS (SALT II)

The goals you have set for your administration would, for the first time since we entered the nuclear age result not in "controls" or "ceilings" but in reductions of the number of nuclear weapons, and you dramatized this issue by your call for a goal of "zero nuclear weapons."

We look forward to the signing of a SALT II treaty with its built-in commitment to move immediately into SALT III negotiations leading to the first real reductions in the effort by the two super powers to cap the nuclear arms race. We are mindful of the up-hill battle that you will need to sustain to realize Senate ratification.

COMPREHENSIVE TEST BAN TREATY (CTBT)

On taking office, you proceeded quickly and aggressively with negotiations to bring to completion the negotiation of a comprehensive test ban treaty.

With the announcement on November 22, 1977 by President Leonid Brezhnev of Soviet willingness to agree to a moratorium on peaceful nuclear explosions (PNE's), there is renewed hope that the Trilateral Negotiations (Great Britain, USSR, and the US) may be in sight of a treaty text.

It is our hope that the CTBT may be signed by the three nations before the opening of the United Nations Special Session on Disarmament on May 23, 1978 giving a psychological boost as 149 nations gather for the first time since World War II to discuss disarmament. We urge you to use your influence to realize this objective.

NON PROLIFERATION OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS

More than any other President and even during your campaign, you raised the consciousness of the country as to the imminent threat of the proliferation of nuclear weapons capability to 10, 20, or 30 additional nations.

The National Council of Churches Resolution on Proliferation of Nuclear Weapons Resulting from Nuclear Fuel Reprocessing Technology adopted by the Governing Board on October 8, 1976 affirms your policy to postpone exports that would make weapons-grade material available.

Because your stand is courageous, it has met formidable opposition and will require continued effort on your part. The NCC is committed by this resolution to support your objectives.

NEUTRON BOMB

The neutron bomb has struck the moral nerve of an unexpected large number of Americans, and throughout Europe.

A bomb that was billed as "clean" which killed people and preserved property stretched the limits of the American tolerance for nuclear weaponry.

It is our understanding that you are awaiting indication of consensus from Europe in support of a decision to produce and deploy.

We urge you to disapprove this weapon, and assure you we are working toward that end.

ARMS SALES

On May 19, 1977 you announced your conventional arms transfer policy. You said, "The virtually unrestrained spread of conventional weaponry threatens stability in every region of the world."

You continued, "I have concluded that the United States will henceforth view arms transfers as an exceptional foreign policy implement to be used only where it can be already demonstrated that the transfer contributes to our national security interests . . . in the future the burden of persuasion will be on those who favor a particular arms sale, rather than those who oppose it."

It is with great disappointment that we do not see your commitment to lead the effort to reduce the international conventional arms race honored.

U.S. world-wide FY '77 sales of $11.5 billion were up from FY '76 and the $13.2 billion in FY '78 represents a 17 percent increase.

How can this but encourage the worldwide growth in militarism with its waste of this earth's resources and its increased risk of war.

MILITARY SPENDING

Again our expectations prompted by your campaign commitment that we would begin a slow but steady decrease in military spending have been met by an FY '78 defense budget with a 9.4 percent increase or 3.4 precent real increase after inflation with the same increase projected out five years.

The size of these expenditures can only be interpreted to mean that domestic priorities will be unmet.

HUMAN RIGHTS

Human Rights is and has been at the heart of the concerns and work of the National Council of Churches. We are therefore heartened by your commitment and your initiatives to include human rights as a basic element in the formation of your foreign policy. The elevation of the Human Rights Office to an Assistant Secretary position in the State Department has changed the tone from the laissez-faire of the past to active commitment.

We are mindful of the power you exert as President to assure that United States aid does not stabilize and support governments "engaging in a consistent pattern of gross violation of human rights." You:

propose which countries receive aid;

arrange sales of military equipment and weaponry to foreign governments (amounting to $11.3 billion in 1977); determine which countries are excepted from human rights considerations;

permit U.S. industries to obtain licenses to sell to foreign purchasers; determine trade policy (trade sanctions, arms embargoes); determine the nature and extent of diplomatic contact: and determine immigration policy for refugees.

We must have deep concerns about the selective nature of the Administration's application of human rights criteria to U.S. foreign policy. We must continue to urge you to use powers delineated above to make the foreign policy criteria credible.

We have for many years worked with our Christian colleagues in South Korea, the Philippines, countries in Latin America, the USSR, and other parts of the world supporting their struggle to gain or recover their human rights.

We believe this is a particularly urgent moment to manifest our long standing concern regarding the situation in South Africa. Violence already is a reality in South Africa, but we must urge you to bring to bear the pressure of full U.S. economic sanctions as the last non-violent action remaining which may yet avert the impending and unacceptable human disaster.

We commend you for your efforts to achieve ratification of the United Nations Covenants on Civil and Political and Economic, and Social and Cultural Rights.

We remain hopeful that the political climate and the Congressional schedule will soon make it possible to actively pursue the ratification of these international treaties to promote and protect human rights.

GENOCIDE TREATY

The tragedy of World War II in which an entire people were almost annihilated can never be allowed to occur again. Genocide must be formally condemned by our country.

In 1948, the U.S. worked very hard on the draft of the Genocide treaty yet we are not one of the eighty-three nations who have ratified it.

Power political groups which had heretofore opposed the treaty such as the American Bar Association have now called for ratification.

We appreciate your support of the treaty and we urge you to continue active efforts to create the climate in the Senate for ratification.

PANAMA CANAL TREATIES

The principle of negotiating a new and more just relationship between the United States and Panama has been strongly affirmed by the National Council of Churches for sometime.

The National Council of Churches in February, 1976 sent a fact-finding delegation to Panama. Since then we have taken action in support of the treaties, and have been at work providing educational resources to inform church members of the significance and value of the treaties.

We commend you for bringing to completion the long years of negotiations, and for your effort to bring about ratification of the treaties.

CONCLUSION

Mr. President, this is not, of course, an exclusive listing of the current concerns of the National Council of Churches, nor of each of its constituent communions. The issues raised here, however, do represent some of the more urgent needs of our nation which we believe require careful consideration and bold initiatives by you and your Administration.

We hope and trust that our reflections will be helpful to you as you make your own assessment of unmet social needs in this country and how government should respond to them. We trust also that you will welcome our views regarding peace and justice issues affecting our relations with other peoples and nations.

Again, we are deeply grateful for the opportunity to meet with you.●

SENATE COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Title IV of the Senate Resolution 4, agreed to by the Senate on February 4, 1977, calls for establishment of a system for a computerized schedule of all meetings and hearings of Senate committees, subcommittees, joint committees, and committees of conference. This title requires all such committees to notify the Office of the Senate Daily Digest—designated by the Rules Committee—of the time, place, and purpose of all meetings when scheduled, and any cancellations or changes in meetings as they occur.

As an interim procedure until the computerization of this information becomes operational, the Office of the Senate Daily Digest will prepare this information for printing in the Extensions of Remarks section of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on Monday and Wednesday of each week.

Any changes in committees scheduling will be indicated by placement of an asterisk to the left of the name of the unit conducting such meetings.

Meetings scheduled for Tuesday, April 4, 1978, may be found in Daily Digest of today's RECORD.

SENATE—Tuesday, April 4, 1978

(Legislative day of Monday, February 6, 1978)

The Senate met at 12 noon, on the expiration of the recess, in executive session, and was called to order by Hon. HARRY F. BYRD, JR., a Senator from the State of Virginia.

PRAYER

Let us pray.

Lord God of the morning, the evening, and the noonday hour, we thank Thee that Thou art always near us, even when we are unaware of Thy presence. Make us to strive for excellence, never satisfied with what we are or do. Set our vision upon high goals. Keep us at tasks too hard for us, that we may be driven to Thee for strength.

Deliver us, O Lord, from self-pity, from concealed sin, and false guilt. Make us sure of the final goal and of the hidden good in the world.

Open our eyes to simple beauty all around us, and our hearts to the greatness and goodness men hide from us because we do not try hard enough to understand them. May Thy spirit of peace and illumination with which we begin this day so enlighten our minds and warm our hearts that all life will glow with new meaning and purpose, and at evening we may rest in Thy grace.

In Thy holy name we pray. Amen.

APPOINTMENT OF ACTING PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The clerk will please read a communication to the Senate from the President pro tempore (Mr. EASTLAND).

The legislative clerk read the following letter:

U.S. SENATE,
PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE,
Washington, D.C., April 4, 1978.

To the Senate:

Under the provisions of rule I, section 3, of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby appoint the Honorable HARRY F. BYRD, JR., a Senator from the State of Virginia, to perform the duties of the Chair.

JAMES O. EASTLAND,
President pro tempore.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. thereupon assumed the chair as Acting President pro tempore.

RECOGNITION OF LEADERSHIP

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the majority and minority leaders be allowed up to 5 minutes each at this point before resuming the treaty, and this will be as in legislative session.

The ACTING PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD). The minority leader is recognized.

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, I yield my time under the order just entered to the distinguished Senator from Virginia (Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR.).

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia (Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR.) is recognized for 5 minutes.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I thank the majority leader and the minority leader for their courtesies.

HEW FUNDS MISSPENT

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. Mr. President, yesterday the Inspector General of the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare reported that between $6.3 and $7.4 billion was misspent by that Department in 1977.

He said that most of the misuse of funds was due to waste and mismanagement, with about $1 billion traceable to fraud and abuse.

I find these figures incredible and appalling.

First, the funds misspent by HEW, at the lowest estimate, consumed the total Federal income tax payments of nearly 5 million American families with incomes of $15,000.

Second, the funds misspent by HEW exceeded by 50 percent the entire expenditure of the Federal Government on energy programs.

Third, the funds misspent by HEW exceeded by 40 percent the entire annual budget of the State of Virginia, a State with a population of 5 million, the 12th largest State in the Union in population.

And, fourth, the amount misspent by HEW equals $17 million a day.

Clearly, the Department of Health, Education, and Welfare is out of hand.

It seems to me that the chief cause of this gross waste of public funds is the astronomical growth of the budget of HEW.

Is it not obvious that money is being appropriated to this sprawling Department at so fast a rate that no one can keep track of it?

Is it not clear that the programs in HEW have mushroomed to the extent that they are out of control?

The total budget of HEW, which includes the social security trust fund, is $165 billion this year. Ten years ago, in 1968, it was one-fourth that amount, or $41 billion.

Just in the last 4 years, from 1974 to 1978, the HEW expenditures have grown from $94 to $165 billion, a gain of 76 percent.

This skyrocketing spending could only lead to misuse of funds. No agency can absorb and use wisely a constantly ballooning quantity of funds of such magnitude.

Each year, during consideration of the HEW budget, I have cited the tremendous growth in the Department's outlays and have warned that too much was being undertaken too fast.

Now from HEW itself comes a report that proves the point.

Congress cannot in good conscience ignore this multibillion-dollar waste.

The most rudimentary sense of responsibility for the stewardship of public funds—the tax dollars paid to the Government by the hard-working men and women of this Nation—demands that this monumental misuse of money be thoroughly investigated.

The General Accounting Office should institute a review of the report of the Inspector General of HEW, analyzing the accuracy of the findings and making such recommendations as may seem appropriate as to measures which can be taken to eliminate this unconscionable waste of tax funds.

Furthermore, I urge that in consideration of HEW programs and budgetary requests for the forthcoming fiscal years, the authorizing and appropriating committees of both Houses of Congress look very closely at each item, bearing in mind the report of the Inspector General that $6.3 billion, at least, has been misspent.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The time allotted to the Senator from Virginia has expired.

Will the minority leader request unanimous consent that the time of the majority leader be given to Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR.?

Mr. BAKER. Mr. President, in light of the fact the distinguished majority leader is the present occupant of the chair, I then on his behalf ask unanimous consent that his time under the previous order be yielded to the distinguished Senator from Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

And the Senator from Virginia, Mr. HARRY FLOOD BYRD, JR., is recognized for an additional 5 minutes if he so desires to utilize them.

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I again thank the distinguished majority leader and distinguished minority leader.

It would be irresponsible to vote increases in funds for programs which are shot through with waste, mismanagement, and fraud.

Yet HEW in the budget Congress is now considering is seeking a $7 billion increase of funds, exclusive of social security.

The increase being sought by HEW in the new budget is a 13-percent increase on top of the tremendous increase that it received just last year.

The amount of increase sought by HEW is the amount the Inspector General of HEW says has been misused due to waste, mismanagement, and fraud.

I recognize that it may be necessary to increase funds for activities designed to monitor and control programs where waste is rampant, but it cannot possibly cost anywhere near as much to improve controls in HEW as the current mismanagement is costing the taxpayer.

We are dealing here with basic questions of competence, accountability, and honesty. The issue must be faced.

The Federal Government—the President and Congress—has a deep obligation to handle tax funds as a public trust. Obviously, this is not being done.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that tables showing appropriated funds for HEW and outlays by the agency, which include trust funds not appropriated in the regular process, from 1970 through 1979, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the tables were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

(The total outlays include social security payments; the appropriated funds figure is exclusive of social security.)

Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, appropriated, funds and total outlays, fiscal years 1970–78, inclusive

Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR. I again thank the distinguished majority leader and the minority leader.

THE PANAMA CANAL TREATY

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Under the order previously entered, the Senate will now resume consideration of Executive N., 95th Congress, 1st session, Calendar No. 2. The time between now and 6 p.m. today will be equally divided and controlled by the Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH) and the Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH) or their designees.

The clerk will report the treaty.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Calendar No. 2, Executive N, 95th Congress, 1st session, the Panama Canal Treaty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time? Time will be equally charged against both sides.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I yield time to the distinguished Senator from Alabama who desires to speak first.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Mr. HATCH yields such time as he may consume to the Senator from Alabama.

(Mr. NELSON assumed the chair.)

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Chair and I thank the distinguished Senator from Utah for yielding to me.

Mr. President, today we have before us one of the most important amendments that has been offered either to this treaty or to the so-called Neutrality Treaty. It is an amendment that would assure that the constitutional processes of the United States will be followed as the treaty called for, in providing for the disposition of the property of the United States in the Canal Zone.

On yesterday, Mr. President, the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH), the chief manager of the treaty, conceded—and it was a concession that was made for the first time in this Chamber by the proponents of these treaties—that the United States does actually own the property in the Canal Zone.

A statement had been made on the floor by a proponent of the treaties that the United States just rents that property, and the President of the United States himself in a fireside chat stated that we do not own the property in the Canal Zone. So I am pleased that those who seek to get the Senate to approve this treaty are now conceding that the United States, does, in fact, own the property in the Canal Zone.

Possibly they were prompted in making that concession by the fact that the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers of the Judiciary Committee did bring into a hearing of that subcommittee the actual records of the deeds themselves showing the transfer of title to this property by the various individual owners of of the property.

I might call attention to part 4 of the hearings of the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers that lists some 3,500 actual transactions with Panamanians in which this property was purchased, the name of the seller and the amount paid for the property.

I might state, too, that at this hearing the gentleman who had served as secretary of a joint United States-Panamanian commission, set up for the purpose of purchasing in the name of the United States the property in the Canal Zone, reported that the rule of thumb they followed in setting a price on this property was to first establish the value of the property and then pay twice that amount for the property.

So, Mr. President, the property belonging to the United States would then bring us under the provisions of article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution which says that Congress shall have the power to dispose of the property of the United States. Nowhere else in the Constitution is any power given to any branch of the Government to transfer property of the United States.

That being true, that being an exclusive grant of power, it would include all other grants unless they were specific in nature, and there are no such grants in the Constitution.

Mr. President, I am pleased that a time has been set for the final disposition of the question of whether or not the Senate shall give its advice and consent to the treaty before us. I am glad, Mr. President, that the Members of the Senate were able to take a recess of some days in length during which time I am sure most of the Senators took occasion to go back to their home States and consult with their constitutents, the Senate having acted on one of these treaties, to find out from their constituents whether their actions in voting for or against the approval of the first treaty met with the approval of their constituents.

I am hopeful that, having gone back and consulted with their constituents, they have come back and will vote what I feel is the will, certainly, in my home State of Alabama, and the will of the people of the United States.

I might say, too, Mr. President, I have noticed in the press that efforts have been made, efforts have been initiated in some States to circulate recall petitions against Senators. I deplore that activity. I deplore it because I feel it is not provided for in the Constitution. No matter what the State law might be on the subject, the U.S. Constitution would control.

There is no method under the Constitution of recalling a Senator. Even if that were not true, Mr. President, and a recall method was provided, I would certainly look with disfavor on any effort to have the passions of the moment control in a matter of this sort.

Senators are elected for 6 years. Their constituents have the right every 6 years to pass upon their records, and I see no reason for any effort of this sort. I think it is unfair to Senators, because I think Senators have a right to vote their convictions whether or not those convictions coincide with the feelings of the people in their home States.

And the people have the right, under the Constitution, every 6 years to recall Senators by the election process.

Then, too, Mr. President, I feel that any such effort is counterproductive, because if I had voted contrary to what I feel are the wishes of the people of Alabama, and had been threatened with defeat at the polls next time, or recall, my inclination would be to dig in with my position as expressed here on the Senate floor. I feel that this effort is counterproductive, and I would certainly emphasize that no Member of the Senate who has been seeking to improve these treaties by amendment, or, failing in that, to vote against them, no Senator who has been on that side of these questions has given any indication of approval of such action back in the States of the Senators involved.

So I hope and I feel confident that Senators will realize that that is a spontaneous action by the people of their States, and has no connection with any thought or action or belief of any Member of the U.S. Senate.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield for a brief comment?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, I will yield to the Senator, but I am not going to make a practice of yielding, I might state. I yield.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I just want to associate myself with the remarks the Senator made relative to the possibility that some States may seek to recall Senators who have voted for ratification of the treaties. Being on the same side of the issue as the Senator from Alabama, I wish to indicate my agreement with the remarks he has made. I think that many may assume or think that they would be helping our cause by initiating such recall petitions, but I do not think that is the case. I share the view of the distinguished Senator from Alabama that it is more likely to be counterproductive.

Furthermore, as the Senator has pointed out, there is no provision in the Constitution for the recall of U.S. Senators, and surely this was by design and deliberate intent of the Founding Fathers, who established a legislative branch where one house would be subject to the control and vote of the people every 2 years, at frequent intervals, and deliberately designed another body where there would be longer terms to be served, and where Senators could feel that they would not be subject to such frequent votes of approval or disapproval by the people, with the purpose in mind of Senators taking the longer view, perhaps, or looking at the issues from a little different perspective.

Certainly, if the provision for the recall of Senators had been included, that probably would have been frustrated, or would certainly not be the same thing.

I certainly hope that some of our colleagues, having been home and had a chance to listen to and talk with their constituents, will come back with a different point of view when we get to the second treaty, and I share the hope of the Senator from Alabama that we may be able to prevail. But I did want to indicate that insofar as that particular matter of recall is concerned, certainly there are those on both sides of the political aisle here who share the view expressed by the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Senator from Michigan (Mr. GRIFFIN) for his very fine comments to emphasize the point that I have been seeking to make.

While I do not know of the status of any such efforts in any of the States, I would make a public plea that any such groups who are seeking to move in that direction cease and desist from such activities, because I do not believe that it is helping us who are seeking first to improve these treaties and second to defeat the treaties if we are unable to improve them.

I might state, Mr. President, that the manner in which the treaties are drafted, the wording of the treaties, makes the vote on this treaty, the Panama Canal Treaty, much more important than the first vote. All the first vote decided was that if the United States should give the Panama Canal away, starting in the year 2000 we should have certain defense rights as to the canal. It is a weak treaty from the standpoint of the United States. Many of us sought to improve it to give us added defense rights. For example, even though the first treaty, the Neutrality Treaty, or, to use another word for it, the Defense Treaty, the first treaty which has been approved gives us certain defense rights, they are weak defense rights, because under the Panama Canal Treaty and the Neutrality Treaty we have to have all of our troops out of Panama by the year 2000, and the Neutrality Treaty or the Defense Treaty gives us a right to defend the canal but deprives us of the means of defending the canal, because all of our troops will be out, and if we do seek to defend the canal, the defense would have to be by amphibious landing or actions involving paratroops. Those of us who tried to improve the treaty tried to have a provision that if the military presence of the United States was necessary for the proper defense of the canal come the year 2000, the President could so certify and we could continue to maintain troops in the Canal Zone for the defense of the canal. The leadership, in its wisdom, called on the Senate to reject our amendment, and reject it the Senate did.

But under the wording of the treaty, somebody among the negotiators seems to have slipped up; they provided that the Neutrality Treaty shall not go into effect unless the other treaty is agreed to. So the question has not been decided. The leadership thought that by putting the cart before the horse and talking about defense down in the year 2000, and getting that treaty approved, the momentum of that action by the Senate would carry forward, and this treaty would be agreed to in short order.

That is not the case. Momentum has stopped. We are going to see whether the administration and the leadership can prevail upon the Senate not only to defend the canal starting with the year 2000, which is all we have decided up to now, but whether they can get the Senate to agree to give the Panama Canal away; whether they can get the Senate to give the Panama Canal away without proceeding in accordance with the provisions of article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution requiring authorization by the entire Congress for the disposition of property of the United States.

Mr. President, it is interesting that the administration and the leadership seek to prevent having this matter considered by the House. I do not say the House is supposed to act upon this treaty; they are not. But this transaction involves giving away 500 square miles of territory and a canal, the replacement value of which is said to be in the neighborhood of $10 billion, and giving that away without complying with this section of the Constitution requiring action by the Congress.

The Panama Canal Treaty of 1955, most recent treaty with Panama, provided in three places in article V that where conveyance of property was being made to Panama, "The United States of America agree that"—and this is the significant phrase—"subject to the enactment of legislation by the Congress, there shall be conveyed to the Republic of Panama free of cost all the right, title and interest held by the United States of America or its agencies in and to certain lands and improvements in the territory under the jurisdiction of the Republic of Panama."

The phrase, "subject to enactment of legislation by the Congress," is used two more times in that article. They recognized that particular point in 1955 and complied with it. Here we have an administration and a leadership that says it is not necessary to have legislation by Congress.

Mr. President, that is all this amendment does. It just says to the treaty proponents:

> All right, go ahead with your treaty, but before it goes into effect we have to comply with Article IV, Section 3, Clause 2 of the Constitution providing for action by Congress for the disposition of property of the United States.

That is all the amendment does. Before this treaty goes into effect compliance with the Constitution must be made regarding getting the authorization from Congress for the disposition of the property.

Why, Mr. President, would the administration not want to call Congress into the act? It takes a two-thirds vote here in the Senate to approve the treaty. It would take only a majority vote in the House. With Members of the House being in many cases closer to the people, up for election every 2 years, frequently going back and touching base with their constituents, are they afraid that the House is too close to the will of the people to risk submitting this matter to the House? One would suspect that that is the case.

Now, Mr. President, I am encouraged as to the outcome of this amendment. I might say that in this 6 or 7 weeks we have been debating these treaties the leadership has stonewalled against every amendment except two amendments called the leadership amendments based on a memorandum agreement between the President and Dictator Torrijos. As to all other amendments they have suggested that such an amendment would defeat the treaties.

I suggest that no Member of the Senate can state with any degree of certainty that any amendment would kill any treaty. Why should it? It merely goes back to Panama for acquiescence. If it is a substantial amendment, possibly a new plebiscite would be called. What is wrong with a plebiscite? What is wrong with a treaty being between the people of the United States and the people of Panama?

Mr. President, I have suggested that no matter how many amendments are added into these treaties they would be accepted by the Panamanian dictator. Do you know why, Mr. President? Just as soon as the treaties go into force, Mr. Torrijos will start collecting $100 million a year. The United States is going to be the guarantor for the Panama Canal Commission, set up by the Panama Canal Treaty, which takes over the property from the Panama Canal Company. We guarantee that at the end of 22 years we are going to convey the canal and all the property in the Canal Zone to Panama free from all debt, free from all loans.

We have what might be called a lien right now against the canal, the Treasury of the United States, the people of the United States, of a mere $319 million which is still owed on the canal from its original construction.

The dictator, in my judgment, will accept anything that will allow him to start collecting $100 million a year.

Mr. President, the leadership approved only two amendments in 6 or 7 weeks. That is quite a record, is it not? They have not approved any amendment by those seeking to strengthen the treaties, this group of Senators 32 strong on the final vote on the Neutrality Treaty.

I was interested just the other day when one of the proponents of the treaties called the result of the first vote on the treaty. He said it would be 68 to 32. Well, that is certainly what the vote was, 68 to 32. That sounds like a landslide vote, but the trouble is that the Constitution provides that treaties must be approved by a two-thirds vote. So, instead of being a landslide vote the first treaty was approved with only 1 vote to spare, because if it had been 66 to 34, the treaty would have failed. Sixty-seven to thirty-three, it would have been approved; 68 to 32, it was approved. But had two Senators who voted for the treaty voted against, it would have been defeated last time.

So I do not feel that this is a foregone conclusion, that they are going to get 67 votes for this treaty; and if they fail to get the 67 votes for this treaty, it kills both treaties.

Mr. President, let us see what the question is. It has already been decided tentatively—it is just a tentative decision, awaiting the outcome of this vote, that is all. We have tentatively decided that if the Panama Canal Treaty giving the canal away is approved, then the Neutrality Treaty goes into effect. But if this treaty is not approved, both treaties fall.

Senators will recall, I am sure, that at least three Senators, two of them on the floor here, stated that they were not pleased with the provisions of the Panama Canal Treaty. One of the Senators who voted for the other treaty said that if he had had to vote that same day on the Panama Canal Treaty, he would vote against it. Another Senator who voted for the treaty said that if he did not get a certain amendment adopted, he would vote against the treaty. Another Senator, on this side of the aisle, stated that his voting for the first treaty did not necessarily mean that he was going to vote for the Panama Canal Treaty.

I do not mention the names of these Senators—not that I feel that it would be an embarrassment to them, but Senators know, and I would not want any added powers of persuasion used on these three particular Senators that I might single out.

I submit, Mr. President, that Senators like, if possible, to be consistent. I submit that there is little, if any, inconsistency in voting that, if the canal is given away, we will defend it in a certain fashion. That is all those 68 Senators have decided, that if the canal is given away, we will defend it in the manner provided by the Neutrality Treaty. What they have not decided is the basic and fundamental question provided by the treaty under consideration now. That is, shall we give the canal away and shall we, in the process, give or guarantee to Panama hundreds of millions of dollars just to take the canal? So, Mr. President, it would not be inconsistent for Senators, having voted to defend the canal starting in the year 2000, to say, yes, I am for defending the canal in the year 2000 if we give the canal away, but I am certainly not in favor of giving the canal away.

It is with that thought, Mr. President, that we continue in this debate because the basic and fundamental question has not yet been decided. It is going to be up to the Senate, in its wisdom, to decide whether or not we are going to give the canal away. But before that, we have to decide whether or not we are going to follow the Constitution and require, before the treaty goes into effect, that the Congress shall pass legislation authorizing the disposition of the property.

Now, Mr. President, the argument has been made as to pretty nearly every amendment that has been offered, oh, we cannot do that, we cannot do that, that will kill the treaty; Mr. Torrijos will not agree to this; we cannot risk having the treaty defeated; Mr. Torrijos will not allow Panama to take this action.

Well, now, we have before us an amendment that places no burden whatsoever on Panama. All it does is define what the treaty says already shall be done. That is to follow our constitutional processes in the matter of ratification of the treaty. The Constitution says that Congress shall have the power to dispose of the property of the United States. All this amendment does is say, yes, let us follow the Constitution; let us make this treaty conditioned, as the 1955 treaty with Panama did, that these provisions are made subject to the enactment of legislation by Congress. That is all it does.

I am glad we got this 1955 treaty talked about, because, for days and days, on the Senate floor, about all we could hear from the proponents of these treaties was about this Colombian firing squad. The distinguished Senator from Idaho, yesterday, dusted off that old story again, that if the Panamanian people had not agreed to the treaty of 1903, they were facing a Colombian firing squad. I thought we left that argument weeks ago, but it was dusted off again in the argument yesterday by the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH).

Let us refer to the 1955 treaty, where property of the United States is given away, where it is conveyed. Oh, it is said, back in 1903, this was colonialism and we did not have two sovereign powers dealing at arm's length with each other, that these Panamanians were afraid that they were going to face a Colombian firing squad if they did not agree to this treaty. Well, I do not suppose there was any danger of a Colombian firing squad 52 years later, when the 1955 treaty was entered into by the United States and Panama. Surely, at that time, they were sovereign nations, dealing at arm's length with each other.

But the 1955 treaty provided that the conveyance of property was subject to approval by the Congress.

Has the Constitution become old hat now that we are in a modern age, different from the situation back in 1955? Should we follow the Constitution in 1955 and not follow it in 1975?

I say the Constitution is just as valid, just as much in force, just as much the instrument that governs our Nation now as it was back then.

That is all we are trying to do. That is all. It does not put any burden on Panama. It merely provides that we shall follow that section of the Constitution.

Mr. President, another reason why we should follow the Constitution, besides being a government under a written Constitution, is the matter that if this route is not followed, unquestionably the validity of this treaty, or the validity of the disposition of the property, to be more accurate, would be subject to litigation.

The Supreme Court has said in other efforts by people who are interested in seeing that the property of the United States is not given away, "Oh, this is premature, we cannot decide this question now, this is action between two bodies of Congress. We can't dispose of that, can't get into that."

Well, once the treaty is sought to be put into force and effect, it would be a fait accompli then. I certainly feel that these reasons why the Supreme Court did not pass on this question on its merits would cease to exist and we would get back to the matter of whether the Constitution has been followed.

I submit that it will not have been followed unless this property is disposed of under authorization of an act of Congress.

So why beat around the bush? Why say, "No, our policy is to accept no amendments, we're not going to accept this amendment." That is the leadership position.

On the other treaty, Mr. President, it was a real bad treaty, to hear some of the present proponents of the treaty: "Oh, it couldn't be agreed to at all, it would be defeated by the Senate."

Some of the leading proponents, the two leaders, wanted to consider it and could not make up their minds for weeks about it. But then they hit on this leadership amendment.

Did the leadership amendment show a lot of ingenuity, resourcefulness, wisdom?

Word for word, the memorandum that the President and the dictator entered into, and it was as full of loopholes and defects as we could imagine.

But they said:

Oh, if the Senate will agree to these amendments, then it is going to be a fine treaty, a treaty we can support, and by the way, it is a treaty that should not be amended any more, just take the leadership amendments based on the memorandum between the President and the dictator and that makes this treaty so fine that it must not be amended any more.

Well, that cuts out a pretty good role for this leadership amendment. We have debated the deficiencies of that amendment. I could point them out again and again. I am not going to take the time of the Senate in doing that.

That treaty, the first treaty that was considered—not the first treaty, because the first treaty would be the treaty giving the canal away, but the first treaty considered by the Senate—was saved by the leadership amendment, deficient as it was and as weak as it was in providing for the defense of the canal. But it was so great, so all-encompassing, that the leadership has taken the position that no more amendments should be offered.

I heard the distinguished majority leader (Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD) on the television program one Sunday a couple of weeks back and he said he had an open mind on amendments. I followed his voting pretty carefully here and I do not recall his favoring an amendment, other than the leadership amendments which had already been agreed to at the time he made that statement. I do not recall the distinguished majority leader voting for a single amendment offered here on the floor of the Senate except for the two leadership amendments, which were deficient as I have pointed out many times on the floor of the Senate.

So I am hopeful that the distinguished majority leader's open mind is going to open wide enough to accept constructive and legitimate amendments, an amendment that has the effrontery to suggest that we follow the Constitution.

I hope that the Senate will open up its collective mind wide enough to allow us to suggest that we follow the Constitution on disposing of property of the United States in Panama.

But, Mr. President, I am encouraged on this matter on the outcome of this amendment. As I say, our high water mark on amendments has been 42 voting in favor of an amendment not approved by the leadership. As I have pointed out, there were two that were approved by the leadership.

I have to come back to the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH) and his attitude, and, while I disagree with his attitude with respect to amendments, I completely agree with his candor. I commend him for it, because his attitude is one of, "Rubber stamp this treaty, we don't want any amendments to it."

Then he says the Senate is not supposed to negotiate treaties, that is for the executive branch.

That is true. The Senate is not supposed to negotiate treaties, Mr. President. But Members of the Senate have the duty imposed upon them to advise and consent with the President on the wording of that treaty.

That is not negotiation. That is still left in the hands of the executive department. But part of our constitutional duty is to advise the President as to whether this treaty is good, good for the country, whether it protects our interests or not. That advice, Mr. President, is not handed down in the form of a communication from the Senate:

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: We think that you ought to renegotiate this treaty and do thus and so.

The advice of the Senate is given in the form of amendments shaping the treaty. That is the way the advice of the Senate is given.

(Mr. FORD assumed the chair.)

Mr. ALLEN. We have this elaborate procedure under rule XXXVII of the Senate. We go into the Committee of the Whole. That is what we are in now. That is the only time the Senate uses the Committee of the Whole. But under the Committee of the Whole procedure, we take up the various articles of the treaty one by one. We are still on article I, by the way. Then, if the committee has any amendments to article I, they offer them.

However, it is a strange thing, Mr. President: These two treaties went to the Foreign Relations Committee for study and for recommendation, and they had dozens of witnesses before the committee. They did not make a single amendment in committee—not one. What they did was to take the unsigned memorandum—by the way, the dictator has a different view of what that memorandum meant from the meaning we ascribe to it. He said that under this memorandum, which became the leadership amendment, we do not have the right to intervene militarily for the protection of the canal. We just have the duty to do it when he calls on us to come down and defend the canal. That same construction, of necessity, carries over to the leadership amendment itself, because the leadership amendment is word for word what the memorandum provided.

What action did the Foreign Relations Committee take? It took his memorandum, and I believe the committee put it in the form of a new article, or possibly two new articles, and adopted it in that form, taking the memorandum word for word and incorporating it as one or two new articles.

The State Department said to the Foreign Relations Committee:

We had better not do it that way. We had better not add a new article, because that will require a new plebiscite in Panama. You had better back up and lick the calf over again.

To use an old Southern expression, I say to the distinguished Presiding Officer, the Senator from Kentucky (Mr. FORD), who is familiar with that expression. They said, "Do the job over."

The Foreign Relations Committee did the job over. Panama represented to the State Department that we had better not do it that way; that we had better take the same language and add it as amendments to existing articles, and that way they can get by without a new plebiscite. What did the Foreign Relations Committee do? It got right in line with that suggestion.

Mr. President, this attitude of stonewalling against amendments is not acceptable to the Senator from Alabama. This attitude of saying, "Yes, here are these treaties before us; rubber stamp them," does not set too well with the Senator from Alabama. I feel that the Senate is abdicating its role, provided under the Constitution, of advising and consenting if it wishes, or nonassenting if it wishes, with respect to treaties that are submitted to it, when it does not take its duty seriously; when the leadership says—I will correct myself there—when the manager of the treaty and apparently the leadership take the position that no amendments must be agreed to.

The leadership saved the first treaty. Oh, they found these great defects in it with respect defense, and they came up with this memorandum; and they said it cured these defects and cured them so well that no other amendment need be offered. They spoke pretty highly of this amendment.

I did not think much of it in many particulars. One that I pointed out was that it leaves us robbed of other means of defense of the canal, by allowing the provision to be in the treaties that we have to remove all our troops by the year 2000. How is that giving the best possible defense to the canal?

The dictator put in another provision, and I wonder whether I should take the time of the Senate to point it out. He got a little paragraph in the leadership amendment, or in the memorandum which became the leadership amendment. This provision said that in any defense of the canal, we should not interfere with the internal affairs of Panama, that we should not interfere with the territorial integrity of Panama. How in the world are you going to land troops there without having something to do with territorial integrity? It also provided that we should not interfere with Panama's independence. Translated, that means, as the Senator from Alabama sees it: "Don't bother my dictatorial regime."

That little paragraph was put in the memorandum, and it was in the leadership amendment, this amendment to serve as the amendment that made all other amendments unnecessary, in the view of the leadership, apparently, because they did not allow any others to be adopted.

But I have digressed. I was pointing out that our highwater mark was 42 votes, and it came on an amendment by the Senator from Alabama having to do with this proposition: Under the Neutrality Treaty, Panama cannot permit any troops of a foreign nation to come into Panama, starting with the year 2000. But, strange to say, the treaty now before the Senate has no such provision. Even though the United States, for the next 22 years, is there to defend the canal, Panama now can bring in troops from foreign countries. What is the logic of that, Mr. President? In the year 2000, when Panama is going it alone, they cannot bring in foreign troops; but for the next 22 years, when we are there to defend the canal, they can bring in foreign troops.

What useful purpose would that be? We do not need anybody down there to help us defend the canal. It would just be a source of irritation and a source of confrontation if Panama brings Cubans or Russians into Panama.

And, Mr. President, I offered an amendment which would have prevented Panama during the next 22 years from inviting in foreign troops to Panama. That amendment was defeated at the behest of the manager of the treaty, backed by the leadership, but we received 42 votes on it.

I believe this amendment that we have before the Senate now that requires complying with the Constitution is going to beat those 42 votes.

As stated a moment ago, I am encouraged as to the outcome of this amendment, and one thing that gives me encouragement is the fact that back in 1975, March 4, 1975, in the Senate there was introduced Senate Resolution 97. I could read that resolution. It would take 15 minutes, I daresay, to read it. That resolution was sponsored by 37 Senators, enough to defeat any treaty.

I shall only read the resolved clause, and it gives all these "whereases": Whereas, The Hay-Paucefote Treaty; whereas The Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty, this and that and the other, but getting down to the meat in the resolution:

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate of the United States of America that—

(1) the Government of the United States should maintain and protect its sovereign rights and jurisdiction over the canal and zone, and should in no way cede, dilute forfeit, neogtiate, or transfer any of these sovereign rights, power, authority, jurisdiction, territory, or property that are indispensably necessary for the protection and security of the United States and the entire Western Hemisphere; and

I might state this is on page 5071 of the Senate portion of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of March 4, 1975.

So, this resolution sponsored by 37 Senators said we should not give the canal away. That is what the paragraph says.

Here is the portion of the resolution that has direct reference, and direct applicability to the amendment before the Senate at this time. Let us see what it says. It carries forward the resolving clause. Resolved, and so forth.

there be no recession—

Meaning receding, of course—

there be no recession to Panama, or other divestiture of any United States-owned property, tangible or intangible, without prior authorization by the Congress (House and Senate), as provided in article IV, section 3, clause 2, of the United States Constitution.

So, in the body of the resolution, one of these whereases, let us read that having to do with this exact issue.

Whereas under article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the United States Constitution, the power to dispose of territory or other property of the United States is specifically vested in the Congress, which includes the House of Representatives;

So this resolution was introduced by 37 Senators. The Senator from Alabama was one of them and he sticks by what he said back then in 1975 as to the inadvisability of giving the canal away and the second portion that if we do give it away we must not give it away unless and until Congress, meaning the House and Senate, authorizes that disposition.

Mr. President, there being eight Members of the Senate who cosponsored that resolution, having these two points involved that we should not enter into a treaty giving the canal away, but if we do we should not give the canal away without complying with the provisions of the Constitution requiring authorization by Congress—those are the two points—but there are eight Members of the Senate at this time who were cosponsors of this resolution who voted for the first treaty.

I discussed on the floor in colloquy with the distinguished majority leader the matter of his former opposition to a canal treaty and then his coming to a position in support of a treaty, and the distinguished Senator stated very logically that he did not have the treaties before him the first time; having read the treaties, considered them, and weighed them, he now feels that the treaties are in the best interest of the United States and should be agreed to here in the Senate, and I accept that as being an accurate representation of the distinguished Senator's feelings.

It is certainly not inconsistent to a fault to change your mind on an issue. But, Mr. President, a constitutional point based on the same facts and construing the same section of the Constitution does not change in 2 years. It might be logical to change your position with respect to voting for a treaty now when under a prior administration of a different party you might be willing to join in a resolution saying that you would not support a treaty giving the canal away. But what justification, Mr. President, is there for saying in 1975 that the Constitution requires the submission of this question of disposition of property of the United States to the whole Congress and in 1978 saying that you do not have to? What possible justification would there be for a reversal of an opinion and an attitude on a constitutional question where there has been no change in the Constitution and no change in the facts? What justification is there for saying in 1975 it has to be submitted to the entire Congress and in 1978, oh, no, the Senate under its treaty-making power can make the disposition of the property of the United States?

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that this resolution, Senate Resolution 97, which can probably be obtained from the document room but, if not, it appears on page 5071 of the Senate portion of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD under date of March 4, 1975, be printed in the RECORD; and I ask further unanimous consent that not only the body of the resolution be set forth in the RECORD but all the cosponsors appearing on this page be listed in the portion inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the resolution was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. RES. 97

Resolution urging retention of undiluted United States sovereignty over the Canal Zone

Whereas United States diplomatic representatives are presently engaged in negotiations with representatives of the de facto Revolutionary Government of Panama, under the declared purpose to surrender to Panama, now or on some future date, United States sovereign rights and treaty obligations, as defined below, to maintain, operate, protect, and otherwise govern the United States-owned canal and its protective frame of the Canal Zone, herein designated as the "canal" and the "zone", respectively, situated within the Isthmus of Panama; and

Whereas title to and ownership of the Canal Zone, under the right "in perpetuity" to exercise sovereign control thereof, were vested absolutely in the United States and recognized to have been so vested in certain solemnly ratified treaties by the United States with Great Britain, Panama, and Colombia, to wit:

(1) The Hay-Pauncefote Treaty of 1901 between the United States and Great Britain, under which the United States adopted the principles of the Convention of Constantinople of 1888 as the rules for operation, regulation, and management of the canal; and

(2) The Hay-Bunau-Varilla Treaty of 1903 between the Republic of Panama and the United States, by the terms of which the Republic of Panama granted full sovereign rights, power, and authority in perpetuity to the United States over the zone for the construction, maintenance, operation, sanitation, and protection of the canal to the entire exclusion of the exercise by the Republic of Panama of any such sovereign rights, power, or authority; and

(3) The Thomson-Urrutia Treaty of April 6, 1914, proclaimed March 30, 1922, between the Republic of Colombia and the United States, under which the Republic of Colombia recognized that the title to the canal and the Panama Railroad is vested "entirely and absolutely" in the United States, which treaty granted important rights in the use of the canal and railroad to Colombia; and

Whereas the United States, in addition to having so acquired title to and ownership of the Canal Zone by constitutional means, purchased all privately owned land and property in the zone making it the most costly United States territorial possession; and

Whereas the United States since 1904 has continuously occupied and exercised sovereign control over the zone, constructed the canal, and, since 1914, for a period of sixty years, operated the canal in a highly efficient manner without interruption, under the terms of the above-mentioned treaties thereby honoring their obligations, at reasonable toll rates to the ships of all nations without discrimination; and

Whereas the long history of friendly and cooperative relations between the United States and the Republic of Panama are prone to deterioration by the dilution of any United States sovereignty or jurisdiction in the canal zone; and

Whereas from 1904 through June 30, 1974, the United States made a total investment in the canal, including defense, at a cost to the taxpayers of the United States of over $6,880,370,000; and

Whereas the investment of the United States in the canal includes the sacrifices of many thousands of United States citizens who have worked to construct the canal and keep it operating smoothly and efficiently for the last sixty years; and

Whereas Panama has, under the terms of the 1903 treaty and the 1936 and 1955 revisions thereof, been adequately compensated for the rights it granted to the United States, in such significantly beneficial manner that said compensation and correlated benefits have constituted a major portion of the economy of Panama giving it the highest per capita income in all of Central America; and

Whereas the canal is of vital and imperative importance to hemispheric defense and to the security of the United States and Panama; and

Whereas approximately 70 per centum of canal traffic either originates or terminates in United States ports, making the continued operation of the canal by the United States vital to its economy; and

Whereas the people of the United States, in various ways and means, have exhibited strong support for retention of full and undiluted jurisdiction over the canal and zone, and the Congress ought to insure the supremacy of the will of the people; and

Whereas the present negotiations under a February 7, 1974, statement of "principles of agreement" by United States Secretary of State Henry A. Kissinger and Panamanian Foreign Minister Juan A. Tack constitute a clear and present danger to the hemispheric security and the successful operation of the canal by the United States under its treaty obligations; and

Whereas the present treaty negotiations are being conducted by our diplomatic representatives under a cloak of unwarranted secrecy, thus withholding from our people and their representatives in Congress information vital to the security of the United States and its legitimate development; and

Whereas the United States House of Representatives, on February 2, 1960, adopted House Concurrent Resolution 459, Eighty-sixth Congress, reaffirming the sovereignty of the United States over the zone territory by the overwhelming vote of three hundred and eighty-two to twelve, thus demonstrating the firm determination of our people that the United States maintain its indispensable sovereignty, and jurisdiction over the canal and the zone; and

Whereas under article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the United States Constitution, the power to dispose of territory or other property of the United States is specifically vested in the Congress, which includes the House of Representatives; and

Whereas the Congress of the United States is invested with constitutional responsibilities to provide for the common defense and general welfare of the United States, to regulate commerce with foreign nations, to raise and support armies and provide and maintain a Navy, to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory of the United States, and to make all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution these and other powers, all of which denote that it is the solemn duty of Congress to safeguard the canal and zone: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That it is the sense of the Senate of the United States of America that—

(1) the Government of the United States should maintain and protect its sovereign rights and jurisdiction over the canal and zone, and should in no way cede, dilute, forfeit, negotiate, or transfer any of these sovereign rights, power, authority, jurisdiction, territory, or property that are indispensably necessary for the protection and security of the United States and the entire Western Hemisphere; and

(2) there be no relinquishment or surrender of any presently vested United States sovereign right, power, or authority or property, tangible or intangible, except by treaty authorized by the Congress and duly ratified by the United States; and

(3) there be no recession to Panama, or other divestiture of any United States-owned property, tangible or intangible, without prior authorization by the Congress (House and Senate), as provided in article IV, section 3, clause 2, of the United States Constitution.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, I have no fault to find with distinguished Senators who cosponsored this resolution taking a different view now, and I am not going to name the Senators. It might possibly embarrass them. I am sure the Senators know who they are, but I am hopeful that these eight Senators who voted for the first treaty will reconsider when this treaty comes up for a final vote, and go back to their original position because, as I say, there were eight Senators who said in 1975, "We won't approve of such a treaty," yet in 1978 they voted for it.

That is all right. Senators have a right to change thier minds. I am sure I have changed my mind on issues here before the Senate from time to time. This, however, is not one of them.

But on the matter of the constitutional issue involved, how can there be a change? I am going to be interested in seeing just what result there is of this issue because the issue has not changed, the Constitution has not changed. Why should there be a different opinion as to what the Constitution means?

Mr. President, it is not Senators alone who are interested in seeing the House of Representatives act on this matter. The House of Representatives, Mr. President, is somewhat jealous of its rights and prerogatives. The Members do not want to be deprived of any of their powers under the Constitution. It is not just the Members of the Senate who say, "Let us let the House in on this decision." I am not talking about the approval of the treaty, Mr. President, as such, and this amendment is not directed at that. It does not say that the House shall have an opportunity to pass on the treaty. That is not the point.

But insofar as the treaty seeks to make disposition of property of the United States, it has gone too far without express authorizations from Congress, going back to the way it was handled with Panama in 1955.

If that was the process back in 1955—and I call attention again to article V of the 1955 treaty—in three separate places where the treaty speaks of disposing of property it has this phrase, "subject to the enactment of legislation by the Congress."

So if our treaty negotiators back then knew that Congress was supposed to act on matters of disposition of U.S. property, why did not Mr. Bunker and Mr. Linowitz know that and write that into the provisions of the treaty as negotiated between the negotiators? Why were they less observant than the negotiators back in 1955? Why were they less vigilant in following the Constitution than the negotiators were when the 1955 treaty was entered into between Panama and the United States?

So, Mr. President——

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on that point for a question?

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY. Is it not also true that under the 1955 treaty there were two additional articles, article VI and article VII of the treaty, that were self-executing, and also provided for the transfer of property?

Mr. ALLEN. I believe the Senator will find those have to do with boundary matters and not express grants of property which require approval of Congress.

Mr. KENNEDY. Well, the adjustments of the boundaries also included the disposition of property.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes, but there is a different rule, I will say to the distinguished Senator, recognizing boundary rights. Obviously, if you recognize a certain boundary to exist you are not giving property away because the boundary would define where the property of one nation stops and the other begins, so it is not a disposition of property.

Mr. KENNEDY. Did the treaty not provide for the adjustment of the boundaries as well as the removal of property from Canal Company books, consistent with the new boundaries?

Mr. ALLEN. Well, removal of property the Senator is talking about—yes, that would be part of the recognition of the boundary, yes, that is correct.

Mr. KENNEDY. As I was listening to the Senator talk about the provisions—and my understanding is the same as that of the Senator from Alabama with regard to article V——

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY (continuing). That article did establish under the agreement that there would be action taken by the Congress. But in the same treaty, articles VI and VII also related to the transfer of property, and there was a transfer of property under those two self-executing provisions to Panama, without further action by Congress.

Mr. ALLEN. I believe the Senator will find those are boundary line disputes and, therefore, no property was really transferred from the United States.

I point out the fact that I merely read one of them. There are three separate instances here in article V where the dispositions are made subject to the enactment of legislation by the Congress.

But I must go on because my time is limited.

Not only the Senate, certain Members of the Senate, but the House of Representatives wants this matter submitted to it. Not necessarily, Mr. President, are they going to vote against the disposition of the property. I have little doubt, Mr. President, that the House of Representatives would in all likelihood, if called upon by the administration to approve this transfer of property, this disposition of property, it would do so.

I do not say that each one of the 235 Members of the House, well over a majority, who have cosponsored House Concurrent Resolution 347—and, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a copy of House Concurrent Resolution 347 be printed in the RECORD at this point, along with a copy of the pending amendment to let them stand side by side.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PANAMA CANAL TREATY

At the end of Article I add the following new section:

5. It is expressly provided that this Treaty shall, in no event, enter into force until the Congress of the United States, in accordance with the provisions of Article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution of the United States of America, shall have disposed of, or shall have authorized the disposition of, the property belonging to the United States of America, or of any of its agencies in the Panama Canal Zone, as it existed on September 7, 1977.

H. CON. RES. 347

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That it is the sense of the Congress of the United States that any right to, title to, or interest in the property of the United States Government agencies in the Panama Canal Zone or any real property and improvements thereon located in the zone should not be conveyed, relinquished, or otherwise disposed of to any foreign government without specific authorization of such conveyance, relinquishment, or other disposition by an Act of Congress.

Mr. ALLEN. Two hundred and thirty-five Members of the House of Representatives are cosponsors of this House concurrent resolution. Now, a concurrent resolution is a more or less in-house action between the two bodies. If it had been a joint resolution, that would be something that would need the President's signature, but House Concurrent Resolution 347 is an in-house resolution, the two Houses acting together on a particular question.

This concurrent resolution says:

It is the sense of the Congress of the United States that any right to, title to, or interest in the property of the United States Government agencies in the Panama Canal Zone, or any real property or improvement thereon located in the zone, should not be conveyed, relinquished, or otherwise disposed of to any foreign government without specific authorization of such conveyance, relinquishment or other disposition by an Act of Congress.

So a majority of the Members of the House have asked for the right to participate in this decision. I daresay some of those 235 would be active supporters of such a bill. But I see the Members of the House being concerned about rights given them under the Constitution, of which they are about to be deprived by the Senate not allowing the House to act on this matter.

The House is quite jealous of certain things that have to originate there in the House of Representatives. Revenue measures have to originate there, even though on some minor bill having little effect on the revenue the Senate has a right to amend such a bill and tack a whole tax reform package on a minor bill having to do with the duty on a certain item of import or something of that sort. The Senate can put anything it wants to on such a bill; but the bill has to originate in the House of Representatives.

Then, too, Mr. President, even though there might be some little difference of opinion, by custom this situation has existed between the two bodies: The House takes the position that, since revenue measures have to originate in the House, therefore, appropriations bills have to originate in the House, even though there is nothing in the Constitution that says that. But since appropriations have a great bearing on what revenue we have to raise, I think it is not illogical that the House have that right.

Article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution gives the House the right to be a party to legislation disposing of property of the United States. Mr. President, I wish the distinguished Senator from Texas (Mr. BENTSEN) were here. I remember several years ago, back around 1970, I believe, and then in 1963, there were treaties with Mexico by the United States. The Rio Grande River, you know, meanders along and is the border between the United States and Mexico, and frequently gets out of its banks. It does not have much bank; it is pretty well flat on the ground, and frequently it changes its course. Sometimes Mexican property ends up on the U.S. side of the river, and sometimes U.S. property ends up on the Mexican side of the river.

In 1963 and 1970, the United States was conveying property of the United States; if I am not mistaken, if my recollection is correct, they entered into a treaty with Mexico to provide for giving this property, or giving control of the property—because the United States did not own it—giving control of the property to Mexico, and we followed it with a statute. We did that in 1970 and did it in 1963, even though the United States did not have fee simple title to the property, as it has to the Panamanian property, the Panama Canal Zone, which was conceded just on yesterday, not in answer to a question but by a unilateral assertion that the United States does the property in the Panama Canal Zone. That was a concession made by the distinguished manager of the treaty, the Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH).

So the 235 Members of the House of Representatives are not necessarily saying, "Let us in on this procedure so we can vote against this disposition." I do not believe that is what those 235 Members of the House of Representatives are saying. They are just saying, "Please, Members of the Senate, and please, administration, recognize our constitutional rights and duties and let us act on this matter."

Is the Senate going to deprive the House of Representatives of the power that it has under the Constitution? If it does, Mr. President, this matter is headed for litigation. And the Supreme Court will not be able to sidestep it by saying the action is premature, or "This is action between the two Houses; we will not intervene on a legislative matter." They will not be able to say that if the Constitution is not complied with.

So why, Mr. President, would we turn down this pending amendment by the distinguished Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH)? I regard it as the most important amendment that has been offered as to this treaty, certainly so far as the constitutional issue is concerned, though perhaps not as important as some amendments that were offered giving us greater defense rights as to the canal; but regarding the application of the Constitution, this amendment is the most important amendment that has been offered to this treaty, and the most important amendment, I daresay, that will be offered to the treaty.

Moreover, Mr. President, as I have pointed out, it does nothing to cause Panama to lose face. That is the argument made against some of these amendments: "Oh, we could not require a sovereign state to knuckle under to a thing like that." But this does not provide for any action by Panama. This is entirely action up here—action within our Government.

The treaties talk about their being ratified in accordance with the constitutional processes of the two governments. Why should we not follow the Constitution in the approval of this treaty? Let us go along with the House in this matter.

Another thing: I see the distinguished Senator from Louisiana (Mr. LONG) is present. As I have pointed out, frequently here in the Senate we take a minor House bill, and the distinguished Senator from Louisiana very wisely generally has three or four of those minor bills on the Senate Calendar that he can call up whenever he has a tax measure or welfare measure or a debt-limit measure, call it up and add such a Senate provision, and then it goes back over to the House of Representatives, where they had not considered these matters added by the Senate amendment.

It is just like the farm bill, though it is not exactly in point because it did not have to go through the Ways and Means Committee of the House or the Finance Committee here in the Senate. They took a little bill having to do with raisins, as passed by the House. It came to the Senate where they called it up and attached this huge farm bill to it. The House did not get to act on the farm bill provision at all. They immediately went to conference on the raisin bill, which was greatly outweighed by the farm bill. Today, early this morning, they agreed upon the farm bill. That action was taken in the conference committee.

I appeal to men such as the distinguished Senator from Louisiana (Mr. LONG). If we attached a major provision to a minor bill here in the Senate, and they go back to the House either to accept or to go to conference, if we have told the House that we are not willing to allow them to consider something they view as their right under the Constitution, with how much favor are they going to look upon important tax bills, important revenue bills, important welfare provisions, welfare reforms, anything that has to go through the two committees, Ways and Means and Finance?

They would say, "Well, Senator LONG, why did you not vote to let us consider this matter as the Constitution provides?"

Comity between the Houses, Mr. President, requires that we lean over backward to see that the House is recognized in the balance of powers we have as between the branches of Government and as between the two Houses.

I do hope, Mr. President, that the Senate will see fit to follow the Constitution and let the House act upon this matter. As I say, I do not feel that all 235 House Members who are cosponsors of this resolution are going to vote against disposal of that property. I dare say many will take the lead in favor of that. But they do want their prerogatives recognized. I say it would be an offense against the dignity of the House to say, "No, this matter must not be considered by the House."

Mr. President, we have had amendments defeated time and time again. We have had the argument made, in effect, that, "If this amendment is agreed to, it will not please the Panamanians. Therefore, we have to defeat the amendment."

If we reject this amendment it might not please the Members of the House of Representatives. Are we less interested in the feelings and the dignity of the House of Representatives than we are the Panamanian dictatorship? We take extra effort to avoid displeasing the Panamanian dictatorship; let us take the same effort here to avoid displeasing our colleagues in the House of Representatives.

That is all this amendment would do. It is not a complicated amendment. It is a simple amendment. It guarantees against future litigation attacking this illegal and unconstitutional transfer of property of the United States. It guarantees that the prerogatives of the House of Representatives will be respected. It guarantees that the Constitution will be followed. All it says is before this treaty shall go into force, the disposition of the property which is owned by the United States in fee simple must be approved by act of Congress.

That does not cast reflections on the dignity of Panama. It does not cause them to take a single act at all. But it does say that we have to take certain acts to comply with the provisions of the Constitution as to what it takes to put the treaty in force. Panama cannot complain. We will have followed the Constitution. We will have honored the rights of the House of Representatives on this constitutional issue. We will have seen to it that the House is allowed to have the duties, the rights, and the responsibilities that the Constitution ascribes to it.

Mr. President, the Constitution provides in article IV, section 3, clause 2 that—

> Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

The power given to Congress over the public property is plenary and exclusive; therefore, the absence of congressional action makes illegal or void any attempted transfer of property by treaty alone.

As chairman of the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers of the Committee on the Judiciary, on July 22, 1977, I initiated an indepth subcommittee investigation of the precise constitutional issue which is the subject of the pending amendment. This investigation by the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers was necessary because the executive department of Government proposed for the first time in the history of the United States to attempt to exercise by treaty alone, with nothing more, the exclusive Congressional power over the disposal of public property.

A study of the issue brings me to the conclusion that the Panama Canal Treaty without a requirement of congressional authorization proposes an illegal, unconstitutional transfer to the Panamanian dictatorship of public property belonging to the people of the United States. Hence it is recommended that there be a direct amendment of the proposed Panama Canal Treaty in order to cure this clear constitutional defect and in order to preclude the possibility—or, indeed, probability—that the treaty, if ratified, might later be declared void as having effected an illegal transfer of public property.

The subcommittee gave careful consideration to evidence amassed over a period of some 8 months from 36 witnesses, from court records, and from many other sources, and made a careful and painstaking analysis of all the precedents relevant to the issues presented as well as on a complete study of all of the recent papers prepared by the many respected legal scholars who have focused their attention on the crucial constitutional question.

To understand why there is a constitutional defect in the proposed Panama Canal Treaty, first it is necessary to understand and define the true nature of the constitutional proposition studied by the subcommittee. Stated simply, the question at issue was whether the President, by virtue of the treatymaking power, could, without congressional assent, exercise an express power of the Congress by making by treaty alone a disposal of public property to a foreign government.

Not at issue, Mr. President, were such questions as whether the United States is sovereign within the Panama Canal Zone or whether the proposed disposition of property is itself advisable or inadvisable. The existence of full sovereignty of the United States in the Canal Zone is a close question, charged with emotion, but the operative language of the Constitution grants to Congress power to dispose of "territory or other property" so that it is completely moot, Mr. President—completely moot—for purposes of this debate whether the United States is or is not sovereign in the Canal Zone. In fact, whether the Canal Zone is unincorporated territory of the United States as was held by the Fifth Circuit Court of Appeals in U.S. v. Husband, 453 F. 2d 1054 (5 Cir. 1971) cert. den. 406 U.S. 935 (1972) is also an issue entirely moot to this debate.

All that matters, Mr. President, is that the United States does own property in the Isthmus of Panama, and since the Constitution gives to Congress the power to dispose of property belonging to the United States, then the requirements of the Constitution are triggered simply by the intention or the proposal that public property of whatever sort be transferred from the public to some other party.

Similarly, strong arguments can and have been made in the Senate and elsewhere regarding virtually every aspect of the proposed disposal of United States public property in the Canal Zone to the Republic of Panama, but, Mr. President, the pending amendment is not intended in itself to advance or to forbid these proposed multibillion dollar property transfers. The pending amendment addresses only the question of the constitutional legality of the proposed property transfers, and it seeks to establish the modes or methods by which these proposed transfers can be legally accomplished in the event the Congress should decide that any proposed transfer is in the national interest.

So this amendment, Mr. President, would not preclude a transfer of public property in the Canal Zone from the United States to Panama, but this amendment would insure that any such transfer was accomplished legally and in accordance with the Constitution.

Finally, Mr. President, inasmuch as nowhere has the claim been made that Congress does not have power to dispose of the territory or other property of the United States, then the only issue properly addressed in this debate is whether or not the power of Congress is express and exclusive. If the power of Congress is express and exclusive—and certainly it clearly is—then the President and the Senate cannot by means of a treaty alone, without any Congressional assent, alienate and transfer property belonging collectively to the citizens of the United States.

Let us, Mr. President keep that latter thought firmly in mind during the conduct of this debate. The property belonging to the United States in the Canal Zone, the zone itself, the fee simple title to the land, and the canal facilities—all estimated in excess of $10 billion in worth and known to be of untold value in terms of our national interest—is, indeed, property owned collectively by every single man, woman, and child who is a citizen of this country. The framers of the Constitution felt, as I am sure a vast majority of the citizens of the country feel strongly today, that public property belonging to all the people should not be transferred by any unauthorized unilateral action of the President and Senate through the treatymaking process and ought to be accomplished, as is provided in the Constitution, only pursuant to authorization or assent given by the whole Congress acting on behalf of all of the people. In kind with all property transfers, any public property transfer can occur legally only with the consent of the owner, the people of the United States in Congress assembled.

Some of the many commentators on this constitutional issue have missed by a wide mark a salient point which must be understood. Dean Louis Pollak, for example, in his recent paper on this subject wholly misunderstands the basic matter at issue. Dean Pollak infers that there is no merit to the argument that the Congress has exclusive power to dispose of U.S. property because public property can be dealt with in the provisions of a treaty. Mr. President, of course, the disposal of public property can properly be the object of a treaty, but the issue is whether it can actually be transferred by the treaty alone. Of course, the President of the United States with the advice and consent of the Senate has the power to make a treaty—a contract really—with a foreign government in which it is proposed or even promised that public property will be transferred, but the President of the United States acting by treaty with the advice and consent of the Senate lacks completely the power actually to make the promised conveyance—that can come only from Congress or can be done only with the assent and under the authority of the Congress. The argument then is not whether the President and Senate can make a treaty concerning a disposal of public property but whether the disposal itself can be accomplished except under express authority of the Congress in the exercise of its exclusive "power to dispose of * * * property * * * belonging to the United States."

Dean Pollak's mistake in this regard is typical of similar errors made by many of those who have given this question only superficial study. By this I mean no disrespect for Dean Pollak. Certainly he is a well respected scholar, but I do feel that in this instance he has entirely missed the boat. I suspect unintentionally he and others have set up a strawman and then, in their argument of this topic, proceeded to knock him down without much effort. The strawman has been this—that the President with the advice and consent of the Senate has concurrent power by treaty to dispose of public property and that the precedents and comments made in the early great debates of the treaty power establish this concurrent nature of the role of the President and the Senate in using the treaty power to deal with matters over which the Congress is given express authority in the Constitution.

Mr. President, long, long ago the issue was put to rest that the President and the Senate can deal by treaty with subjects within the province of the Congress. Thus, treaties can deal with the regulation of commerce and can promise indemnities or make financial commitments; however, Mr. President, in no context can a treaty actually carry into effect by its own terms an action over which Congress is given by the Constitution express authority. So Dean Pollak sets up a strawman by arguing that those of us who are seeking to uphold the constitutional power of Congress are seeking to deny the authority of the President and the Senate to make a treaty concerning a disposal of public property. Naturally, Dean Pollak has no trouble whatsoever demolishing that position. But that is not the position, Mr. President, that the proponents of the pending amendment have taken and either the real issue has been misunderstood as a result of superficial and hurried study or it has been misunderstood in an effort to misconstrue our arguments in order to make it possible to have an answer for them.

In short, Mr. President, the proponents of the pending amendment do not claim and would never claim that a disposition of public property cannot be conditionally agreed to in the treaty-making process, but we do claim—and we claim from a solid constitutional base—that no valid transfer can occur by the operation of a treaty without express congressional authorization; that is, without express authorization from both Houses of the Congress by statute.

So the issue, Mr. President, is simply whether the congressional power to dispose of public property will be upheld by the Senate and, hence, whether the proposed Panama Canal Treaty will be freed from constitutional defect by providing in it for congressional authorization of the public property disposals which it proposes.

The amendment is needed because without it, the Panamanians would be justified in asserting that they were not on notice of our constitutional requirement in this respect and that the proposed treaty itself was sufficient to effect the promised property transfer. Now, Mr. President, I recognize that article II, paragraph 1 provides that the Panama Canal Treaty "shall be subject to ratification in accordance with the constitutional procedures of the two parties." But that provision is not sufficient to alert Panama to the fact that our Constitution has not changed since the last property disposal was made to Panama in 1955 and that like the treaty of 1955 this new proposed treaty, insofar as it would effect a property disposal, is—and I quote from the treaty of 1955—"subject to the enactment of authorizing legislation by the Congress." So let us not mislead Panama in this respect. Let us instead adopt the pending amendment so that Panama will recognize that something more is required—that one more step is required beyond the approval by the Senate of these treaties before any public property belonging to the citizens of the United States can be transferred from the United States to any third party To do otherwise would be unfair, illegal, and—in terms of our domestic law—unconstitutional.

I might add also that should this amendment not be adopted, the requirement for congressional authorization of the property disposal will still remain. In other words, Mr. President, the adoption of this amendment is not the determinative factor in insuring the compliance of our Government with the provisions of the Constitution. Should this amendment fail, it will still be necessary before any property transfer could occur in Panama for the full Congress to authorize the transfer. Therefore, conceivably—and I believe this is something no Senator would want—the Panama Canal Treaty could be ratified and Panama would expect to receive the U.S. public property promised to Panama by the treaty, yet it could take years and possibly never for the Congress to authorize that transfer either in whole or in part. This amendment, therefore, should have the support of all Senators, both proponents and opponents of the treaty, since this amendment is primarily designed to alert Panama to the particular provision of the our U.S. Constitution which vests in Congress final authority over any disposal of U.S. public property.

Now, the Attorney General, like Dean Pollak, has also seen fit, I believe somewhat hurriedly, to issue an opinion appearing to state that a disposal of publice property can occur by the mechanism and exclusive action of a treaty made with the advice and consent of the Senate. Again, like Dean Pollak, the Attorney General completely misunderstands the issue. He makes the same mistake Dean Pollak makes because again he argues that the specific grant of authority to Congress to dispose of property does not prevent the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to deal with a property disposal by treaty. Obviously—and I say this again, Mr. President, for emphasis—it is entirely constitutional for the President to conclude a treaty which has in part as its subject matter a proposed disposal of public property belonging to the United States, it would be proper also for the Senate to give its advice and consent to a treaty dealing with a property disposal, but it is not proper for the President to assert that the treaty power alone is sufficient actually to accomplish the transfer. The Attorney General, Mr. President, fails to appreciate this distinction, and his rather short analysis of the subject, which relies primarily on dicta from cases not on point, leads many to the conclusion that the Attorney General could not have studied carefully the constitutional question that has been under study for many months in the Senate.

I greatly respect and admire the Attorney General, but the Attorney General must deal with thousands of questions of great importance day after day and must, therefore, rely heavily on subordinates. Also, perhaps we should be candid with each other during debate of this important question and perhaps therefore we should recognize openly that, after all, the Attorney General is essentially a lawyer serving a client. So let us not give too much weight to this superficial, hurried analysis done by an Attorney General serving a client and, in essence, arguing a case. Obviously, the Attorney General cannot be free from bias in studying this matter since, even at the time the opinion was issued, the Department of Justice was defending the President and the Secretary of State in a lawsuit brought against them dealing with precisely the subject matter of the pending amendment.

But if the opponents of the proposed amendment insist on relying on the opinion of the Attorney General, it will be necessary to explain in greater detail why it is completely faulty. But one thing is certain, however, Mr. President, the opponents of this amendment are not going to quote from the opinion of the Attorney General of the United States issued in 1899 wherein that Attorney General stated:

> The power to dispose permanently of the public lands and public property . . . rests in Congress and, in the absence of a statute conferring such power, cannot be exercised by the Executive Department for the government.

We will not hear that opinion quoted to us during this debate by the opponents of the amendment, and properly so, because the opinion of an Attorney General cannot be permitted to be given any serious weight in studying this fundamental issue of constitutional law.

As I pointed out immediately before the recess, Justice Jackson, when sitting as a Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, rejected his very own opinion issued previously when he had served in the capacity of Attorney General. Justice Jackson had the honesty and integrity to refuse to accept his own opinion as Attorney General because, and he stated this about his own work, Attorneys General may not have the time to study truly a close legal question when serving in the difficult administrative and political environment in which they inevitably work.

So, Mr. President, let us not simply wave before the Senate a copy of an opinion of the Attorney General. Let us instead analyze this question for ourselves and, in so doing, let us uphold the Constitution of the United States.

Now, what does the Constitution say? The Constitution says, "The Congress shall have the power to dispose of * * * property belonging to the United States." The Constitution also says that the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, may conclude treaties with foreign governments. How are these two provisions in the text of the Constitution reconciled—and I might state at this point, Mr. President, that the Constitution itself is the best evidence of its meaning, and it is to the Constitution itself that we should pay greatest attention in analyzing the merits of the pending amendment. And in examining the Constitution, we do find these two provisions, on the one hand an express grant of power to the Congress to dispose of public property, and on the other hand the grant of power to the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to conclude treaties.

There are two cardinal rules of construction which must be used to properly understand the impact of these two grants of power in the Constitution. The first rule of constitutional and statutory construction is that express mention signifies an implied exclusion. This rule the Supreme Court has employed again and again. For instance, in Botany Worsted Mills v. United States, 278 U.S. 282, at p. 289, the Court said:

> When a statute limits a thing to be done to a particular mode, it includes the negative of any other mode.

In other words, if there is an express procedure set up, then other possible procedures are negated or forbidden. In this case, since the Constitution establishes the mode by which public property is disposed, that established, express mode excludes any other conceivable mode of disposal under the rule of construction, the rule of express mention. Nowhere in the treaty power is any mention made of the disposal of public property; therefore, the rule of express mention negates the use of the treaty power as a mode for disposing of public property because express mention of that mode is made elsewhere. The rule of express mention does not prevent the treaty power from addressing the issue of a disposal of public property, but it does prevent, in terms of modality, the disposal by treaty alone of public property.

This same rule of express mention was well known and often invoked by the founders of the United States during deliberations on the Constitution and the organization of the Government; for example, Egbert Benson in the first Congress, in which sat many framers and ratifiers, stated unequivocally that:

> It cannot be rationally intended that all offices should be held during good behavior, because the Constitution has declared [only] one office to be held by this tenure.

Thus, the fact emphasized by the opponents of the pending amendment that the property clause contains no language excluding concurrent jurisdiction of the treaty power is of no significance whatsoever. Obviously, the framers could not have drafted a national constitutional document if they had been required in each instance in which power was granted to exclude expressly every other conceivable agency of the Government which might exercise the power conferred. The language of the Constitution, expressly giving to Congress the power to dispose of public property, therefore, under this cardinal rule of construction, leads to the conclusion that the President and Senate under the treaty power were excluded from concurrent authority.

Secondly, there is another settled rule of constitutional and statutory construction which must be used to understand the interaction of these two provisions of the Constitution. This second rule is that the specific governs the general. In Swiss National Insurance Co. v. Miller, 289 Fed. 570, at p. 574 (App. D.C. 1923), the Court said:

> Where there is an act, a specific provision relating to a particular subject, that provision must govern in respect to that subject as against general provisions in other parts of the act, although the latter, standing alone, would be broad enough to include the subject to which the more particular provision relates.

In the words of the Supreme Court in Buffum v. Chase National Bank, 192 F. 2d 58, 61 (7 Cir. 1951):

> General language of a statutory provision, although broad enough to include it, will not be held to apply to a matter specifically dealt with in another part of the same enactment.

Viewed in this light, the facts stressed by proponents of the concurrent power theory, that the framers contemplated that a treaty could "affect" territorial rights, is far from decisive since a treaty affecting territorial rights could yet be subject to the specific and special congressional "power to dispose." In short, in terms of the present issue, the specific power of disposition of territory or other property belonging to the United States governs and limits the general treaty provision.

Therefore, Mr. President, under these two, well-recognized rules of constitutional construction, it is of no moment that, as one of the witnesses before the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers testified on behalf of the administration, and I quote:

> There is no restraint expressed in the treaty power in respect to dispositions.

No restraint is expressed because under these basic, well-known canons of construction no restraint was needed to be expressed. Obviously, the treaty power itself would have extended for several pages if every congressional restraint on the treaty power were required to be specifically enumerated.

Oddly enough, Mr. President, the opponents of this amendment have relied on commentators who have relied rather heavily and ironically on a passage from Geofroy v. Riggs, 133 U.S. 258. This passage is found at page 267 and reads as follows:

> The treaty power, as expressed in the Constitution, is in terms unlimited except by those restraints which are found in that instrument.

Notably, Mr. President, the citation from Geofroy does not call for express restraints—the Court saw it to be entirely sufficient that restraints be found, Mr. President, in the Constitution in order to limit the treaty power. It follows that the implied exclusion and limitation on the treaty power in the case of property disposal is found in the Constitution by virtue of the express grant of the disposal power to Congress, both because the rule of express mention negates the use of any other mode and because the rule that the specific governs the general requires a limitation on the general treaty power by the specific disposal power.

The operation of both these canons of constitutional construction is made apparent in the Supreme Court's flat statement in Sioux Tribe of Indians v. United States, 316 U.S. 317, at p. 326 (1942):

> Since the Constitution places the authority to dispose of public lands exclusively in Congress, the executive's power to convey any interest in the lands must be traced to Congressional delegation of its authority.

Now, Mr. President, there are other sources of evidence which can and will be examined during the conduct of this debate. But no source is superior to the primary source, and that primary source is unambiguous in granting exclusively to Congress the power to dispose of the property of the people of the United States. But beyond the Constitution itself, Mr. President, virtually every other piece of evidence we have examined leads also to the inescapable conclusion that the disposal power is indeed an exclusive power of Congress. The sources of these additional items of evidence are, first, the intent of the framers of the Constitution as expressed in debate during the Constitutional Convention in 1787; second, consistent past treaty practice; and third, the various judicial authorities.

Without today going into detail in each of these areas I simply note that the limited records that do exist of the Constitutional Convention appear to demonstrate that the framers of the Constitution had the intent to preclude the President, with the advice and consent of the Senate, from acting through the treaty mode alone to dispose of Government property. Second, I note that past treaty practice supports the exclusive power of Congress to cause the disposal of property belonging to the United States. While it is true that certain treaties of peace have been concluded by which boundary disputes have been settled, nowhere has a treaty itself purported to transfer property clearly belonging to the United States. In this respect, the Committee on Foreign Relations itself has failed to appreciate the distinction between a treaty of cession and a treaty of recognition. A treaty of cession involves a disposal of property to which title has vested in the people of the United States, whereas a treaty of recognition involves simply the acknowledgement of another country's title to disputed territory along an unresolved boundary. If this distinction is properly appreciated, then it is obvious that past treaty practice supports fully the exclusive power of Congress to cause a disposal of public property.

Thus, for example, in the Treaty between Panama and the United States concluded in 1955, the United States specifically made subject to the enactment of authorizing legislation that portion of the treaty which transferred public property to Panama. In the same treaty, where certain, very minor boundary adjustments were also accomplished, no specific mention was made of the congressional power to dispose. The treaty of 1955, therefore, is a perfect illustration of the distinction between boundary adjustments made in treaties of recognition and property disposals covered by treaties of cession, a distinction which the August Committee on Foreign Relations has completely failed to appreciate.

Finally, Mr. President, I will conclude by observing that the judicial authorities do not dispose of this question. The United States, in the main, has been an acquisitive Nation, a growing Nation, and only rarely has the United States given up public property to foreign governments. In those cases in which the United States has given up public property to foreign governments, there has always been congressional authorization. Therefore, there has never been a situation in which the courts have been asked to decide whether a property disposal can occur through the mode of a treaty alone, as opposed to the normal mode of disposal by congressional action or consent.

There are many cases, however, that have examined the power of Congress to dispose in relation to the exercise by the President of his powers. In all of those cases, Mr. President, the courts have held consistently that the President's power must be traced to a delegation or authorization by Congress. The opponents of the amendment, no doubt, will cite the same melange of dicta which has already been cited to the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers arising out of certain Indian treaty cases, but at this stage, I will comment only that these cases provide dicta only and, if closely analyzed, actually lend themselves support to the proposition that no public property may be transferred except by the Congress of the United States.

In concluding, I call particular attention to a bill pending in the House of Representatives, H.R. 11634, which would authorize the disposal of public property in Panama pursuant to the proposed treaties. I will not support this bill and I will work against its passage, but this bill or a similar measure is the only way by which the property of the United States can be constitutionally transferred to the Panamanian dictatorship.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I know the Senator from Massachusetts has been waiting patiently, and I yield to him such time as he may consume.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator will state it .

Mr. HATCH. Who has the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland has the floor and the time has been divided equally to both sides. The Senator from Maryland is yielding to the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I yield such time as the Senator may desire.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair recognies the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, earlier in the discussion of the Senator from Alabama, he made reference to article V of the 1955 treaty, which required action by the Congress on the disposition of certain properties.

I made reference to this treaty as well, to article VI and article VII, which were couched in self-executing terms, involving a change in the boundary of the Canal Zone. Then we entered into a brief dialog about whether the change of boundary was really a change of property.

I would just like to complete my comment on those particular provisions of articles VI and VII, and include in the RECORD what these articles provided for in terms of transfer of property. The transfer under article VI included a strip of water around the Colon Shores, an unused site known as Battery Morgan, and a small portion of the Colon end of the Colon Corridor. The property transferred under article VII consisted of a landing pier and the land and water area under the pier.

These clearly were transfers of property. You can define them as being adjustments of boundaries, but unquestionably, they included the transfer of property. This transfer was consistent, really, with the treaty powers under article II of the Constitution and with Supreme Court interpretations of the transfer of property as being a legitimate function of the article II provision for treaties between the United States and foreign countries. Perhaps later in our comments, we can develop that treaty-making power in greater detail.

I know that reference is made to the special arrangements between the United States and Panama, but I think that, in a very careful review of the history even of those arrangements, we can see a number of examples where there has been a transfer of property on the basis of treaty.

The proponents of the amendment which is now before the Senate can also point to examples where there has been concurrent congressional action. This points out quite clearly what, at least, is my understanding of the law, that we can use the provisions of either article II or article IV of the Constitution for the transfer of property.

That has been the position of all executives throughout the history of our country. It is the understanding of a distinguished group of constitutional attorneys, the Justice Department, and many other groups who have studied the Constitution. It is, perhaps most importantly, the understanding of the Supreme Court of the United States in its holdings. Again, we may have the opportunity to explore the details of those holdings later in this discussion.

Mr. President, I should like just to address the Senate briefly on the basic treaty before us and then to make a further comment on the amendment before the Senate this afternoon.

Last month, Mr. President, the Senate of the United States wisely adopted the Resolution of Ratification of the Panama Canal Neutrality Treaty. This treaty permanently guarantees an open, accessible, secure, and efficient waterway between the Pacific and the Atlantic.

This month, the Senate can and should adopt the Resolution of Ratification of the basic Panama Canal Treaty. This treaty will transfer control of the canal to the Republic of Panama by the year 2000—completing a historical process which has been at the heart of Panama's search for territorial integrity since it became independent in 1903.

We meet after having seen and heard again from our constituents during the spring recess. I am convinced that more and more Americans are learning about the specifics of these treaties, and as a result, more and more will lend the treaties their support. This trend is confirmed by the public opinion polls. After the Senate approved the neutrality treaty, our action was endorsed by a 49 to 41 percent margin in the latest Harris survey. Even at the start of our debate on the basic treaty, it is supported by a 44 to 39 percent margin, and I predict that the margin will increase as the Senate moves to approve this treaty as well.

For those who continue to have concerns and reservations, I hope that they will carefully reconsider them on their merits, and weigh them against the long-term benefits of the Panama Canal treaties as a whole. When there are serious points at issue, they should be seriously discussed and resolved. What is objectionable, Mr. President, is the effort of a well-organized lobby in this country, not to reason over differences, but to put unreasonable pressure on Members of this body to vote against what they genuinely believe to be in our best national interests. This lobby has even launched efforts to recall Members of the Senate for voting their consciences.

I believe these recall efforts will fail. They will fail because the single issue which counts the most for the American people is what is in the best interest of our country, which has always sought to do what is right. And the American people are recognizing that it is both right and in our best, long-term interest to ratify the Panama Canal treaties.

Our best political interest is served by establishing a lasting relationship of cooperation rather than confrontation with Panama—by demonstrating to Latin America and the world that the United States is too great a nation to rely on the inequalities of the past instead of the political partnership of the future.

We can only join hands with the people of Panama if we recognize the justice of their 75-year-old claim to the very heartland of their country.

Our best economic interest is served through assured, expeditious use of the canal by our shipping under terms that are fair to us, to Panama, and to all countries of the world. The overwhelming majority of Americans understand by now what the Western Hemisphere has always understood: that the Canal Zone has been Panamanian territory ever since Panama became independent in 1903. Our true interest was never to own the canal, but to use it, and we must join hands with the people of Panama to assure the fair and efficient use of this waterway.

Our best security interest is served by the permanent neutrality of the canal, and by our ability to act against aggression or threats directed against the canal or against transit through it. We must join hands with the people of Panama to assure the continued security and efficiency of this key waterway.

Whether narrowly defined or broadly defined, Mr. President, our interests are well served by the Panama Canal treaties. To be true to our own traditions, our responsibility cannot be limited to what merely benefits the United States: It must extend to what is just to Panama.

And it surely is just that the government and people of Panama should look forward to ending foreign military occupation over their own territory, that they should look forward to regaining full national control over their own territory almost 100 years after independence.

Would the American people have accepted French occupation of the Mississippi River in the 19th century, let alone in the 20th? No, we would have struggled unceasingly against this injustice, just as the people of Panama have since 1903.

Historians will surely remark on the protection of American interests under the Panama Canal treaties. But they will just as surely remark on the understanding displayed by the Government and people of Panama—who have decided to wait 22 more years before regaining what has been rightfully theirs for this entire century. They deserve recognition for negotiating in good faith with four American administrations over 14 years; for voting in favor of the Panama Canal treaties after they were negotiated and signed in Washington; for preparing to work as partners with us in assuring the neutrality as well as the fair and efficient operation of a canal in which we all can take great pride, not just in this century but in the next.

Not only the American people but the Panamanian people are following each development in this debate, Mr. President. Many in Panama have been seriously concerned by efforts in this body to extend our defense rights over their own affairs. When he was in Washington last September, General Torrijos rightly warned that the neutrality pact "could, if it is not administered judiciously by future generations, become an instrument of permanent intervention."

This is why I opposed the amendment to the resolution of ratification, designed to permit the use of military force if the Panama Canal is closed "or its operations interferred with." Fortunately, the Senate voted decisively against making this an amendment to the neutrality treaty itself. The right of military action is and must continue to be defined by article IV of that treaty: We can act against aggression or threats to the canal and canal transit; we cannot act against the territoril integrity or political independence of Panama; we must not intervene in the Panama Canal on any pretext labeled as interference with its operations. Still more importantly, we can and should join with Panama in assuring that no need for military action arises in that part of the world.

Mr. President, I have said that the people of Panama have demonstrated understanding of the political needs underlying the amendments adopted by the Senate to date. We, in turn, should act with responsibility and restraint, so that any changes that we seek are not only consistent with the treaties as negotiated, but responsive to real and valid American interests. If we act in this manner, we can look forward not only to mutual acquiescence in these treaties, but to friendship and cooperation in carrying them out.

We should recognize that the basic treaty before us goes a very long way to meeting the basic interests and concerns of Americans, in the full use and efficient management of the Panama Canal.

The United States will continue to operate the canal until the year 2000. Until that time, five out of the nine board members of the Panama Canal Commission will be Americans, and the Commission will operate the canal in accordance with U.S. law.

During this period of continued U.S. control, Panamanians will move into all levels of canal management and will be prepared to run this waterway when they achieve control by the end of the century. From this perspective it is surely the residents of Panama who are being more than fair and reasonable in exercising their full rights of sovereignty in the 21st century, after having held these rights in abeyance throughout the 20th century.

And Panama itself has a fundamental interest in the efficient management and full international use of the canal. Panama derives 12 percent of its gross domestic product and 18 percent of its foreign exchange earnings from canal-related activities. Under the new treaties, the earnings of Panama will depend on the amount of shipping that moves through the canal. Panama, not the United States or any other country, will be the biggest loser if traffic through the canal should diminish.

Last week, President Carter traveled to Latin America to further the important objectives of the United States in this hemisphere: The expansion of political, economic and social ties; the promotion of human rights; the safe use and effective control of nuclear energy.

It was brought home once again how important the ratification of the Panama Canal treaties will be to new directions and new hopes for our relations with Latin America.

The fact is that Latin Americans have viewed our Panama Canal policies for years as a litmus test of our relations in the Western Hemisphere. The canal has cut through not only Panama, but the hemisphere as a whole. American President after American President has talked about new relationships of equality and maturity. This is a critical opportunity for the United States to match words with deeds—not only to make Panama whole, but to begin to make our relationships whole with all peoples of this hemisphere.

So we must move ahead. The United States did not come into this world to occupy and colonize foreign territory. We did not come to impose our military will on the weak nations of this Earth. The foundation of our influence and stature in the world will always be our interest in liberty and fairness—in what is right. And that is why I am confident that, consistent with our national security interests, the Senate will choose moral strength over imperial strength by adopting the Panama Canal Treaty this month—and by clearing the way for the United States to pursue its other important priorities, domestic and foreign.

Mr. President, I would now like to comment briefly on the amendment which is before is at this time, the Hatch amendment. This amendment would require both Houses of Congress to act to dispose of U.S. property in the Panama Canal Zone.

There is no question in my mind that the treaty could have been negotiated in a form requiring such action under article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution—if both parties so desired. There are precedents for taking this course in transferring American property to foreign states.

But there is also no question in my mind that the power to dspose of U.S. property is available separately and concurrently to the President and the Senate under article II, section 2, clause 2 of the Constitution—permitting the President to make treaties "by and with the advice and consent of the Senate."

Last year, the Attorney General stated his opinion that—

Territory or property belonging to the United States may be disposed of by action of the President and the Senate under the treaty clause.

Last month, 15 leading constitutional scholars, including professors Paul Freund and Lawrence Tribe of Harvard Law School, advised the Congress that:

The Constitution unequivocally permits transfer by treaty of property belonging to the United States. The treaty power, and the power of Congress under Article IV, Section 3, Clause 2 of the Constitution, are concurrent powers, and either may be used to transfer property.

Even before the 1903 treaty with Panama, the Supreme Court had confirmed that the treaty power could be used for the transfer of lands—notably in Holden against Joy (1876) and Jones against Meehan (1899). In addition to our treaties with Indian tribes, there are 12 treaties which have transferred property from the United States to other nations—from our 1819 treaty with Spain to our 1971 treaties, in which the Senate approved transfer of the Ryukyu and Daito Islands to Japan and transfer of the Swan Island to Honduras.

I am, therefore, in full accord with the Committee on Foreign Relations, which concluded in its report that—

The Constitutional text, the intent of the framers, opinions of the Supreme Court, and historical precedent all suggest that the Panama Canal Treaty can validly transfer to Panama property belonging to the United States without a need for implementing legislation.

What I strongly oppose, Mr. President, is any effort to detract from the treaty powers of the President and the Senate. With the current comprehensive treaties before us, involvement of the House would suggest that the Senate no longer has the sole legislative authority in the treaty-making process. This would, to my mind, violate article II of the Constitution and constitute an intolerable precedent for the future foreign policies of our country.

Mr. President, perhaps I could engage the floor manager in a further development of this particular issue which is before the Senate at the present time.

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield for just a moment?

Mr. KENNEDY. I am glad to.

Mr. SARBANES. I want to underscore the reference which the Senator made to the letter sent to the Congress by 15 distinguished legal scholars, deans of our leading law schools and leading professors of constitutional law, because I think they state the question that is before us with respect to this amendment in a very succinct and concise way and also give a very forthright response to it.

I think if I take just a moment of the Senate's time to read the letter from which the Senator quoted, it might make some contribution to this debate.

Their letter stated:

We have been informed that the constitutional validity of the new Panama Canal Treaty has been questioned by several lawyers who have claimed that the United States may transfer its property only by legislation enacted by Congress and may not transfer its property by treaty.

We respectfully submit that such a claim is erroneous.

The Constitution unequivocally permits transfer by treaty of property belonging to the United States. The treaty power, and the power of Congress under Article IV, Section 3, Clause 2 of the Constitution, are concurrent powers, and either may be used to transfer property.

The treaty power extends to all proper subjects of negotiations with foreign nations; a transfer of United States property is such a subject, and accordingly may be effected by treaty.

Now, that puts the issue and the response to it, in as succinct a manner as one can do it. It is very strong for the position which I think our practice in this country supports over the history of the Republic, that property can be transferred by the treaty power, as well as by a legislative enactment on the part of the Congress.

The other point I want to add is that it was implied yesterday that, somehow or other, the President was seeking to reach out for extra power.

Nothing could be further from the case. The President has come to the Congress with this treaty. No treaty can take effect unless two-thirds—two-thirds—of the Members of the Senate of the United States are prepared to advise and consent to the treaty.

So the President's actions with respect to negotiating a treaty can only have an effect if the Senate is prepared by a two-thirds vote to advise and consent to the treaty.

(Mr. MELCHER assumed the chair.)

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator, I know, is well aware of the statement by presidents of the American Society of International Law which have reached the same conclusion.

Mr. HATCH. Will the Senator yield on this point?

Mr. KENNEDY. I will be glad to yield in just a few minutes, if I might finish on this point.

Mr. HATCH. I thank the Senator.

Mr. KENNEDY. I think we ought to make that part of the RECORD. I will just refer to the relevant section, and I quote:

The Constitution grants the President the power to make treaties by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and these treaties become the supreme law of the land. The Constitution also empowers the Congress to dispose of property belonging to the United States. Nothing in the language of the two clauses limits the treaty power with respect to dispositions of property.

This is a statement by a distinguished group of presidents and past presidents of the American Society of International Law.

I understand that this is the opinion of most of our leading constitutional authorities, the presidents of the American Society of International Law, and also is the view of the committee and the holding of the Supreme Court, dating to the last century, both explicitly and in its dicta.

I referred to the Holden against Joy case in 1872—and I will enter the relevant finding in the RECORD:

It is insisted that the President and the Senate, in concluding such a treaty, could not lawfully covenant that a patent should issue to convey lands which belonged to the United States without the consent of Congress, which cannot be admitted. On the contrary, there are many authorities where it is held that a treaty may convey to grantee a good title to such lands without an act of Congress conferring it.

Am I correct that in its review of the constitutional precedents, it was the conclusion of the committee and the courts that article II as well as article IV of the Constitution grant concurrent powers and that the transfer of property could be realized under the treaty-making authority and power of article II? That is my reading of the holdings, as well as the dicta, of the Supreme Court. That is my understanding, and I assume that is the understanding of the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. The Senator is correct.

The Attorney General of the United States, of course, came before the committee and, in effect, rendered a legal opinion to the committee.

The Senator from Utah suggested on the floor yesterday that no representative of the State Department or the Department of Justice has cited a single case or read from the text of a single constitutional treatise any statement by any member of the Supreme Court or any other court that even remotely suggest that Congress power to dispose of United States territory is not an exclusive power.

All I want to say is that the Senator may disagree or seek to disagree with the interpretation that representatives of the State Department or the Department of Justice place on a case. But to make the assertion that they have not cited a case and have not, in effect, put together an able legal document in support of their position simply does not square with the facts.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. SARBANES. I would like to finish.

Mr. HATCH. I would like to know the case they cited.

Mr. SARBANES. That is not the Senator's assertion. The Senator's assertion was that they had not cited a single case.

Mr. HATCH. That is right, and I do not believe they have.

Mr. SARBANES. They have. The legal opinion of the Attorney General discusses the wording of the Constitution. It discusses the ratification process of the Constitution in order to deal with the meanings of it. It discusses certain cases.

Mr. HATCH. But not one case——

Mr. SARBANES. And it discusses treaty practice in this country.

The Senator may want to quarrel with the Attorney General in his view. The Senator may want to quarrel with the 15 deans and constitutional lawyers who have communicated with the Members of the Senate. The Senator may want to quarrel with the presidents of the American Society of International Law. But all have reached conclusions different from that of the Senator.

In fact, the Attorney General concluded his statement——

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, if the Senator——

Mr. SARBANES. If the Senator would desist, I would be happy to yield to the Senator after I have a chance to make the point.

Mr. HATCH. I will be delighted to desist. However, I would like——

Mr. SARBANES. I recall yesterday——

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, I would like to have an understanding with the Senator from Utah. I would like to finish my exchange with the Senator from Maryland and then enter into an exchange with the Senator from Utah.

I believe I have the floor, Mr. President. Therefore, I am going to continue my dialog with the Senator from Maryland, and after I have completed that, I will be glad to yield to the Senator from Utah or to yield the floor, and let the Senator from Utah address questions to the Senator from Maryland. I would like to proceed in that way. I have not taken a great deal of time in this debate, and I would like to complete my inquiries with the floor manager.

Mr. CHURCH. I insist on the regular order, Mr. President.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized, and he does not yield at this time, except to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Massachusetts let me make a 10-second statement? I have to leave the floor. That is the only reason why I tried to interject at this point.

Mr. KENNEDY. The Senator from Utah has already used 10 seconds, but I will yield him 10 seconds more.

Mr. HATCH. I wanted to interject at that point because I have to leave the floor, but I will discuss this thoroughly later and discuss the 15 law professors and the argument made by the Senator from Massachusetts and the Senator from Maryland.

I apologize for having attempted to interject at this point, but that is the reason. I just wanted to make it clear in the record. I will return later and make these points clear.

I thank my friend from Massachusetts.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, as the Senator from Maryland was pointing out, I think the case has been made during this debate that there are basically three important holdings of the Supreme Court on issues which are directly related to this amendment.

There is the Geoffrey against Riggs case of 1890, which states that the treaty power is unlimited, except when otherwise provided in the Constitution. Clearly, there can be no agreement through the treaty-making power if it is going to violate other constitutional provisions. But quite clearly, that would not only be a common and a reasonable understanding of the treaty power, it has been reaffirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Then, the cases of Holden against Joy and Jones against Meehan, 1872 and 1899 respectively, conclude that a treaty may convey good title without an additional act of Congress. This is basically the holding of those two cases.

So you have the language of article II and the interpretation of what its parameters in Geoffrey against Riggs. You have the reaffirmation in the cases of Holden against Joy and Jones against Meehan, that a treaty may convey good title without an additional act of Congress.

As I understand, after the late 1800's, the Supreme Court has made no holdings that would challenge those particular decisions, which represent the supreme law of the land.

Finally, Mr. President, one of the points made by the proponents of this amendment is that we have a rather unique relationship with Panama because of our historic ties, our numerous agreements and treaties, and the important commercial and security interests of the United States. Therefore, what we really have to do is to look at the range of agreements with Panama itself that affect the territorial transfer issue.

And as I read these agreements, the record is basically mixed. There have been transfers of property under treaties and there have also been transfer of properties under actions of both Houses. We have the examples of both, and I will include those shortly in the RECORD.

As I understand it, this makes the case of the Senator from Maryland and the great majority of the members of the Foreign Relations Committee, that the transfer of property can be accomplished either under article II or article IV. In the closer examination of even our relationship with Panama, we can see different instances over the history where each article has been used. I think that this is an important point. Is my understanding of that correct as far as the Senator from Maryland is concerned?

Those who support the Hatch amendment refer to the 1933 agreement which involved changes of boundaries, the 1942 agreement which concerned land parcels in Panama, and the 1955 treaty whose article V required implementing legislation—but whose article VI and article VII provided for the transfer of property without any executing legislation.

On the other side, we have the treaties of 1936 where the United States gave up the right to take land from Panama: The rather extraordinary provision in the 1903 treaty which effectively permitted the United States to take any land in Panama at any time at its sole discretion. We have the 1950 treaty which provided for the Colon Corridor adjustment for highways, and the 1955 treaties which included the articles VI and VII already cited.

So is my understanding correct that in the transfer of property there have been examples of where the treatymaking power under article II has been used and examples where article IV has been used?

Mr. SARBANES. The Senator is correct. We do not contend that property can be transferred only by the treaty-making power. Our position is that property can be transferred in one of two ways: Through the treatymaking power or under article IV by enactment of Congress.

It is important, I think, to note that the supporters of this amendment have cited a number of cases that dealt with the question of whether either the executive or the judiciary could transfer property of the United States without the involvement of the legislative branch of our Government, and it is clear under the Constitution that cannot be done. The President alone cannot transfer property, nor the courts. The President, however, either with the approval of two-thirds of the Senate of the United States, acting through the treatymaking power, can transfer property, or, alternatively, it can be done by majority action of both Houses of Congress, both the House of Representatives and the Senate. But in either instance there is an involvement of the legislative branch of the Government, and the cases which reject any assertion of executive authority to do it alone are quite correct.

This Executive has not made that assertion. Although it has been implied and said yesterday that there was a reach for power unprecedented in our history, that is clearly not the case. The President has submitted this treaty to the Senate and awaits the Senate's action upon the treaty, and in order for it to be approved it has to have a two-thirds vote which is an extraordinary majority of this body.

In fact, if I may add this comment, I think it is a reflection of the substantive merits of these treaty provisions that the Neutrality Treaty did in fact command the support of 68 Members of the Senate, and I am hopeful that the Panama Canal Treaty will likewise command in excess of two-thirds of the body.

It is almost impossible to get two-thirds of Senators to agree on anything, and if you can get them to agree on something as invloved and as important as the treaties that are before us I think that speaks to the merits of the treaties in terms of how well the substance of the treaties enhance, protect, and further American interests with respect to our situation in Panama and elsewhere in the world.

Mr. KENNEDY. I shall just pursue further with the Senator from Maryland. Now that we have talked about the special relationship between the United States and Panama, in the majority of cases the transfer of property has been accomplished either under the treaty-making provisions or under the legislation where we have disposed of excess foreign property. At least that is my understanding.

Furthermore, the most recent case which comes to mind is a case which is familiar to the Senator from Maryland. It is the treaty between Japan and the United States, involving the reversion of a sizable transfer of land in 1971. This obviously was a matter of key security interest to the United States involving millions of dollars in property of the United States, transferred through the treaty. Am I not correct?

Mr. SARBANES. The Senator is correct.

Mr. KENNEDY. As to this particular amendment of the Senator from Utah, where some Members actually voted for that treaty back in 1971, they will have an opportunity to explain any distinction in their vote. But am I not basically correct that over the period of historical precedents treaties have been a means and mechanism by which property has been transferred?

Mr. SARBANES. Treaties have been one of the means and mechanisms.

Mr. KENNEDY. That is right.

Mr. SARBANES. And statutes have been another. Again I do not want to overstate our position. We recognize both approaches as appropriate. There is a concurrent authority, and it has been done in both ways over the course of the history of the Republic. But I think the references that the Senator has made are good references and support the line of argument which he has advanced here on the floor of the Senate today.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. Just in 1 minute.

Mr. ALLEN. Yes.

Mr. KENNEDY. As I understand the Foreign Excess Property Act has proved a principal interest for the transfer of property under article IV of the Constitution.

Finally, let me just ask the Senator from Maryland, who has been a floor manager, whether he has received any assurances from the supporters of this particular amendment that under this particular procedure, it would only require a majority of the Members of the Senate effectively to dispose of U.S. property, just as it would only require a majority of the Members of the House of Representatives? Is it his understanding that those who are putting this amendment forward are prepared to give an early time agreement for disposition of this issue, or has the Senator been unable to determine that this is the position of the Senator from Utah and those who are cosponsoring the amendment?

Mr. SARBANES. The Senator asked a very interesting question, and I have to say to the Senator we have received no indication of that sort.

One might hazard a guess that what the proponents of this amendment, the opponents of the treaty, in fact, may like to have is a totally new hybrid animal that requires a two-thirds approval in the Senate of the United States and a majority approval in the House of Representatives.

It is very interesting—and I want to underscore this—that the constitutional system that was devised by the Founding Fathers and under which we operate with respect to the disposal of property, in that instance in which the President, working only with the Senate, will dispose of property through the treaty power, that a two-thirds vote in the Senate is required.

In those instances in which you use the other authority, the statutory authority, then you need only a majority vote in each House.

But there has been no indication that the involvement of the House is designed to diminish the requirement in the Senate from two-thirds to a majority, and I would assume the contention would be that clearly under the treatymaking power you require two-thirds of the Senate, and that is what would be necessary. But the question is a very interesting one.

Mr. KENNEDY. I would just venture to say it might be a "tribrid" proposal, because you would have the basic treaty, the transfer of property, and then the implementing legislation. It just begins to show perhaps how ridiculous this would be, in terms of any fair evaluation of the diplomatic history of this country or the Constitution or the teachings of the Supreme Court or the understandings of the Founding Fathers.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I am glad to yield.

Mr. ALLEN. I believe the distinguished Senators are a little confused as to the attitude of the Senators who are seeking to strengthen this treaty. We do not propose that this treaty be considered by the House, and the Senators well know that. What we are insisting upon is that the Constitution requires that legislation be adopted by Congress—that is not this treaty, that is an entirely different matter—authorizing the disposition of this property. This treaty would not be submitted to the House, but before the treaty could go into effect it would require legislation, another piece of legislation altogether, and it is not a question of any hybrid animal.

This treaty would not be considered in the Senate and in the House. Only the matter providing for the disposition of the property.

On another matter, I would like to suggest that I am a little surprised that the distinguished Senator from Massachusetts uses the treaty with Japan returning to Japanese sovereignty the Ryukyu Islands. The United States did not own the Ryukyus, as we all know. We did not gain that title to that by conquest, and this was not property of the United States as is the property in the Canal Zone.

What was transferred was not the property itself but our right of control over these islands. So this treaty is not in point as to the executive with a two-thirds vote in the Senate by treaty conveying property of the United States.

I would like to call the Senator's attention to the nonanalogy of the illustration.

Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, the point I would make on this is that the rights of the United States in the Ryukyu Islands were basically comparable, under the treaty with Japan, to the rights of the United States under the Treaty of 1903 with Panama and, therefore, the parallel is real in terms of the essence of the issue, and that is the transfer of property.

Several Senators addressed the Chair.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I want to support the Senator in that statement.

I think the parallel is very definitely real. In fact, it was stated at the time there was residual sovereignty for Japan much as there was residual sovereignty for Panama.

We had an extended discussion with the Senator from Alabama yesterday over this question of ownership, sovereignty, and jurisdiction, and the whole bundle of property rights that you can have. With respect to the Japanese treaty involving the Ryukyu Islands, it was stated at the time that about the only power the United States did not have with respect to those islands was to transfer them to some third party.

So no matter how extensive one wants to define the rights in the Canal Zone, they are certainly not more extensive than that, and in that sense the parallel is very close, and the disposition of those islands is a very apt analogy to draw in the situation with respect to the authority of the treatymaking power with respect to the transfer of property.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. Just one final point. We owned the airport, the naval air station, and other facilities in the case of Japan. This is a direct parallel, I think, to the case of the Panama Canal. Both properties are to be transferred by treaty. Then there were other rights dealing with both administration, legislation, and jurisdiction which we transferred to Japan by treaty.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I yield.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. I rise in support of the Senator's contention. There is a definite parallel in the Ryukyu Islands. We built facilities which became part of the realty which the United States owned. This is much in parallel with the case of Panama, so I think the citation of the Ryukyu Islands Treaty between Japan and the United States is very much in line.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. KENNEDY. I thank the Senator from Hawaii. Obviously, he is well-briefed and he understands fully the nature of our commitment in that part of the world. Having his comments on it I think has been very helpful.

I would be glad to yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Senator.

The Senator, particularly the distinguished Senator from Maryland, was saying that the property rights were the same. Of course, that is not correct because the United States purchased and owns in fee simple the property in the Panama Canal Zone, and I have a record——

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield on that point?

Mr. ALLEN. No. I have not even finished my remarks.

The situation is entirely different. We had possession of the Ryukyus by conquest, but we know that does not vest fee simple title in the United States. So far from the situation being as the distinguished Senator from Hawaii said that we owned the land, we did not own the land. Therefore, when we gave back the islands obviously we gave back the improvements on the land. So there is no parallel at all.

We own the Panama Canal Zone by deed and by grant from the Panamanian Government. No such situation exists with respect to the Ryukyus. That was conquest, and that does not vest title under international law.

Mr. KENNEDY. I wish to make one statement, and then I would welcome yielding. My understanding is different from the understanding of the Senator from Alabama. Basically, one-third of the property—and I would like to be corrected by the Senator from Maryland—was clear title based upon a prior claim of the Panama Railroad Company.

The second third was the quitclaim from the private claims in Panama. And the final third represented untitled land. But there is very serious question and controversy as to the nature of the title in all of these areas. It is not as the Senator from Alabama has described it.

Mr. ALLEN. Just quoting——

Mr. KENNEDY. I thank the Senator from Maryland for his understanding of it.

Mr. SARBANES. I want to say the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts is correct. I do want to say in fairness to the Senator from Alabama that in the statement he just made he was very careful, after talking about owning it in fee simple and having bought it, when he made his final statement, to say that we had acquired it by deed which, I assume, are the purchases from private landowners, and by grant from the Panamanian Government.

Now, that statement, properly explained, is probably correct. What it means—and this is important—is that, first of all, we paid over $4 million to private people who owned property, some of the property in the area that is now the Canal Zone, and we, in effect, got whatever title they had.

Whatever title it was, it is not the equivalent of the property right that the sovereign government of that area has. If the Government of Great Britain or the Government of France comes to the United States and buys property from American citizens in the United States, it does not get a title to that property that is the equivalent of the title of the U.S. Government with respect to what it can do. The right of eminent domain, for example, to take over the property. By buying that property from private owners in this country, they are not able to create a little France or a little England somewhere in the United States and assert that they have rights there to the exclusion of the Government of the United States. So even though we bought those private titles from private owners—and we should have done it; they should have been compensated, in fact, the 1903 treaty had some very careful provisions as to that. But the fact that we made that purchase from private owners did not create a little United States in that area. That is the first point.

The second point is the reference to the grant from Panama. The fact of the matter is that we got title to some of the territory by buying the rights of the Panama Railroad, and the balance of it was public lands of the country of Panama; and we did not buy them in the same sense as we bought the Louisiana Purchase or bought Alaska. In fact, we have been paying an annual payment to Panama ever since the 1903 treaty took effect. With respect to the annual payment, which came some time after the initial treaty was signed, because there was a lump-sum payment, then no payments for a certain number of years, and then we picked up with an annual payment, an analogy has been made to the effect of that annual payment being comparable to rent. And that is not a bad analogy, either.

But in neither instance did we acquire that bundle of rights of ownership, sovereignty, jurisdiction, and all the rest of it, so that the area became for us the equivalent of the area we acquired under the Louisiana Purchase or by the acquisition of Alaska.

If foreign citizens have a child in the area encompassed by the Louisiana Purchase or by Alaska, that child is an American citizen. That is not the case in the Panama Canal Zone. The 1903 Treaty is very careful to make the point that we are not the sovereign. We get certain rights as though sovereign with respect to that area.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SARBANES. So these acquisitions did not give us the kind of property rights with respect to those areas that we acquired in the Louisiana Purchase or in the purchase of Alaska.

I think that the statement which the Senator from Massachusetts has made is eminently correct, and in fairness to the Senator from Alabama, we did note that he recognized that it was more than just by a deed from private property owners that we exercised jurisdiction over the area that encompasses the Panama Canal Zone.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. SARBANES. Yes, I yield to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Senator. I do not really need the distinguished Senator from Maryland to advise the Senator from Alabama.

He brings the word "sovereignty" into this debate all the time. We are not talking about sovereignty; we are talking about ownership of property.

I would like also to call the Senator's attention to a statement made here on the floor by the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH) on yesterday. The Senator from Maryland was here at the time, I believe.

Said Mr. CHURCH:

> I want to make it clear at the outset, that no one favoring the treaties, to my knowledge, denies that the United States has title to property in the Panama Canal Zone. I listened with some curiosity to the extended brief presented by the distinguished Senator from North Carolina concerning the origins of the United States legal title to property in the Canal Zone. He took an hour and a half pressing an open door. Of course, the United States acquired legal title to property lying within the boundaries of the Canal Zone.

I would suggest that the distinguished Senator from Maryland ought to tell the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH) if he disagrees with Mr. CHURCH, who says we do own the property in the Panama Canal Zone.

I repeat, it is not a question of sovereignty. That is not involved. This red herring is continually dragged across the terrain by the proponents of the treaty.

What is involved is the transfer. Nobody claims sovereignty is being transferred. What is being transferred is property, and the Constitution requires that the House of Representatives, not as a part of the ratification of the treaty but in a separate piece of legislation, along with the Senate, enact a statute authorizing transfer of the property.

It is not a question of sovereignty; it is a question of ownership of property. The Senator from Idaho has conceded that we own it. Now there is an argument between the proponents of the treaty, apparently, because they seem unable to agree on whether we own it or not. The President, in his fireside chat, said we do not own the property, so apparently there is a difference of opinion here, but I am willing to take the opinion of the distinguished Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH) that we do own the property in the Panama Canal Zone, and I have here a record of some 3,500 transactions in which the United States purchased property from the private owners.

So let us not talk about sovereignty. Let us talk about the property that the United States owns in the Canal Zone, which requires, for its disposition, an act of Congress. Not approval of the treaty; that is not involved. This is a separate act of Congress that is required.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I would like to make just two points in response to that.

One is that while it may be a matter of indifference to the Senator from Alabama whether he is treated fairly, I want to assure him that it is not a matter of indifference to the managers of the bill, and I try to be scrupulously fair.

In responding to the Senator from Massachusetts, who recognizes, I think, what we had said, and who recognizes the fact that the Senator from Alabama phrases it in a way that it embodies both approaches——

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SARBANES. It is my intention, throughout the remainder of this debate, to continue to be fair to the Senator from Alabama.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Mr. President, will the Senator from Maryland yield?

Mr. SARBANES. Let me make one further point.

The Senator from Vermont (Mr. LEAHY), at one point in this debate, said that this debate was much like a soap opera, because when you went away and came back to it, the same theme was being developed.

I might say to the Senator from Alabama I was reminded of that statement, because, as he will well recall since it happened only yesterday afternoon, he and I and the Senator from Idaho had an extended discussion about the question of ownership, sovereignty, jurisdiction, and the President's fireside chat, and the assertion that it had been inaccurate or misleading, and of course our contention that it was not when read in full.

I only hope that the people who have read the RECORD and followed this debate will recall that exchange. I do not intend to embark upon it again.

I yield to the Senator from Hawaii. I know the Senator from Arizona has been waiting. I intend to yield the floor shortly so he may deliver his statement.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. I thank the Senator from Maryland for yielding.

I do not believe the Senator from Alabama meant to say, as I believe he said earlier, that we owned no part of the Ryukyu Islands. The Senator will recall, I am sure, inasmuch as the Senate during his time ratified the treaty between Japan and the United States for the return of the Ryukyu Islands to Japan, that we did, in fact, pay individual owners of the property for the airstrip, and that the United States did, in fact, own realty in the Ryukyu Islands. I am sure, now that the Senator's memory has been refreshed, the Senator recalls that.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. MATSUNAGA. So there is a definite parallel between Panama and the Ryukyu Islands.

Mr. ALLEN. What the Senator from Alabama was objecting to was the statement that we owned the Ryukyu Islands, which we did not own. It was merely by conquest. We know that title does not vest in a conqueror. As the distinguished Senator said, we were giving the land back to Japan. So it was Japan's land, of course.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. But the parallel lies in the fact that we did pay for realty in Panama, which the Senator from Alabama says we own by conveyance. It is just as in the case of the Ryukyu Islands, where we dealt not with the Japanese Government, but with the individual owners of land. For example, there is the airstrip, wherein we did pay the individual owners for the land. So while the individual owners had no claim to that land, for which we paid the individuals, we still did not, because of the lack of sovereignty, own such property and had to return such land to the Japanese Government. The parallel, as I see it, is so clear. Just because we have no exercise of sovereignty over Panama, and we do not, the property for which we paid the individual owners still is not property which we can say is within our sovereignty and, therefore, is American property, to which article IV applies.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Senator. If he sees the parallel between ownership of an airstrip and ownership of the entire Panama Canal Zone, I will say he can see something there that I cannot. In the conveyance to Japan, revesting sovereignty in Japan to the islands that we got by conquest, we still own the airstrip property which we purchased. There has been no authorization for its disposition.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. But the parallel lies. The case does apply in the case of Panama now because we did, by treaty, convey or reconvey to Japan——

Mr. ALLEN. No, we did not convey the property. The Senator is mistaken, I feel sure.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. Is it not by treaty that we returned the Ryukyu Islands to Japan and not by legislation?

Mr. ALLEN. It was by treaty. We did not return the land. We returned the oversight and sovereignty. That is all we returned.

Mr. MATSUNAGA. I am talking about the land which we purchased. We did exercise even fee simple rights over the land, which we purchased directly from the individual owners. It is just as with the Panama Canal.

Mr. ALLEN. If the Senator will show me that the treaty provided for transfer of realty as distinguished from transfer of sovereignty, then I think he might be able to draw some parallel. But if we owned it at that time and Congress has not authorized the disposition of it, we still own it, even though Japan has sovereignty over it. I thank the Senator.

Mr. SARBANES. I thank the Senator from Hawaii. I believe he has made some extremely effective points with respect to the parallel between the two cases. I think the analogy he drew is absolutely on point.

Mr. President, how much time remains under the division?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland has 108 minutes and the Senator from Arizona has 78 minutes.

Mr. SARBANES. I know the Senator has been patiently waiting. I yield the floor.

Mr. GOLDWATER. How much time do I have, Mr. President ?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MOYNIHAN). The Senator from Arizona has 78 minutes remaining.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I assure the Chair I will not use all that time.

Mr. President, I rise to support the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH), which I am cosponsoring.

Before I begin I might make an observation relative to the discussion concerning Okinawa and the disposition of property. As to the transfer of personal property, there was legislation which authorized it, the Foreign Excess Property Disposal Act of 1947, which conferred implied authority upon the President to convey the personal property to Japan. That did not necessitate a treaty.

Mr. President, this may be the most important amendment before us during the long debate on the Panama Canal treaties. In fact, it may be even more important than the treaties themselves, in the long run.

For if we establish the precedent now of allowing the Executive by a treaty to usurp the powers given to the whole Congress, it will be built on and built on by future administrations until our representative form of Government has been radically altered.

Mr. President, I am shocked that the State Department and the Foreign Relations Committee have not devoted adequate attention to this issue. I congratulate the Senator from Utah for the outstanding and documented address he presented on the subject and also the Senator from Alabama (Mr. ALLEN), who has done yeoman's work in analyzing this issue as chairman of the Subcommittee on Separation of Powers.

Before I proceed to the substance of my remarks, let me explain just what this amendment is all about. For I believe many Senators have not yet understood just what our contention is.

We do not argue that the President cannot negotiate a treaty relating to the transfer of U.S. property.

We do not argue that a treaty cannot deal with the subject of transferring property belonging to the United States.

We do not argue that the U.S. Government cannot agree with another nation to transfer property.

In fact, Mr. President, it requires action by a treaty to first agree with a foreign country to dispose of property and then it requires a statute to complete that transfer. In fact, it takes both.

Nor, do we contend that in no case whatsoever can a treaty be self-executing.

Rather, we say that when a treaty calls for the transfer of property belonging to the United States, it cannot be carried into final operation without Congress passing a law to execute that treaty.

In other words, the President can negotiate a treaty relating to the transfer of property and that treaty can be brought to the Senate for its advice and consent. But that treaty is subject to the constitutional processes of our country, which in the case of the transfer of property requires action by the whole Congress to carry it into operation.

I. EFFECT ON REPRESENTATIVE GOVERNMENT

Mr. President, to show just how absurd the notion is that says a treaty itself can transfer property, let us look at the effect this proposition would have upon the people in the several States. If we do, we will see immediately that the idea makes a mockery of popular rule and representative government, which were at the heart of the plan of government established by the framers.

In 1787, the year of the Constitutional Convention, the total population of free citizens in the country was estimated to be 2,223,000. Omitting Rhode Island, which did not send any delegates to the Convention and did not join the Union until May 29, 1790, the population was 2,165,000.

Until Rhode Island was admitted, it took only 16 Senators from 8 States, the smallest in population, to ratify a treaty. They contained a total population of 934,000. The other one-third of the States contained 1,231,000 persons. The population statistics I am giving come from the tables actually used in the Constitutional Convention.

In other words, 43 percent of the people could approve a treaty against the will of 57 percent. Even if the 13th State, Rhode Island, were included in this calculation, the power of severing the United States would be given to a minority of four-ninths of the people, if it can be done by treaty alone.

Moreover, the framers fully expected several States having small populations to be added to the Union, such as Vermont, Maine, and Kentucky. They knew this development would add to the imbalance given the less populated regions in making treaties.

Mr. President, if we look at the latest census statistics, the result is even more striking. According to the 1970 census, there are 34 States with a population of fewer than 4 million persons. Under the theory which the State Department is using, a treaty ratified by 68 Senators representing only 62 million citizens in these 34 States could give away the Panama Canal against the protest of 32 Senators representing 140 million citizens in 16 States.

This means that States having a combined total of only 31 percent of the national population could overrule the Senators from States containing 69 percent of the people.

Mr. President, it is an absurdity to contend that the framers intended to give a power to a small minority of the population to dominate the great majority. Such a result is totally contradictory to the political thinking of the patriots who framed the Constitution and voted for it in the several State ratifying conventions.

There is no question in my mind that the framers meant for any proposed transfer of Government property or territory which might have an important bearing on the economy or security of the country, to be conditioned on the passage of legislation by the whole Congress. That is why they gave Congress the specific power in article IV to dispose of property.

And, remember that in the early years of the Republic, the Senate was elected, not by the people, but by legislatures of the States. The only check upon the President's authority to give away the territory of the United States was a nonrepresentative body, if Government property might be transferred without act of Congress. The popularly elected body, the House of Representatives, in whom was expressly vested the power to dispose of public property as a joint partner with the Senate, would be divested of this power.

II. SECRECY IN MAKING TREATIES PROVES REQUIREMENT OF EXERCISING POPULAR WILL TO DISPOSE OF PROPERTY

Mr. President, there is another aspect of the treatymaking power which reveals the absurdity in supposing that by a treaty the President and Senate might exclude the House of Representatives from acting on the transfer of Government property.

In the Federalist Paper No. 64, John Jay discusses the nature of the treaty power at length. He claims that one of the decisive reasons the framers chose to place the treatymaking authority in the Senate, jointly with the President, is that—

> Our negotiations for treaties shall have every advantage which can be derived . . . from secrecy and dispatch . . .

Alexander Hamilton says the same thing in the Federalist Paper No. 75. He argues that the large numbers of the House of Representatives are incompatible with secrecy and dispatch, which are essential to the proper making of treaties.

This reasoning may be suitable to making self-executing treaties which do not impinge on the express powers of Congress; but if the treaty power is claimed to be broad enough for carrying into execution the specific powers conferred upon Congress, then how ridiculous it would sound, in a representative government, to claim that U.S. territory could be given away in a secret session of the Senate without giving time for popular protest. This is the logical extension of the idea put forth by the State Department, but had it been suggested to the American people during the ratification process, public opinion would have been so shocked that the Constitution would have failed of adoption.

The reasoning of Jay and Hamilton, which was widely circulated to influence public support for the Constitution, makes sense only if enabling legislation was necessary to carry out such a treaty which had been made in secrecy.

III. VOTES AT CONSTITUTIONAL CONVENTION UPHELD EXCLUSIVE POWER OF CONGRESS TO DISPOSE OF PROPERTY

Mr. President, we have examined the important considerations which influenced the framers in drafting the treaty clause. Now, let us see what the framers and supporters of the Constitution actually said and did on the subject of yielding public property by a treaty.

It is true that the Constitutional Convention rejected at least two proposed amendments which would have added the House of Representatives to the making of treaties. One of these was presented on August 23, 1787, and the other on September 7.

However, this does not mean the Convention rejected the need for enabling legislation when a treaty extends to the powers of Congress. Each of the defeated amendments was offered after August 18, when, on the motion of James Madison, the Convention referred to its Committee on Detail the proposition that the Congress shall have the power "to dispose of the unappropriated lands of the United States."

As is described in a landmark study by Prof. Arthur Bestor of the intent of the framers in the domain of foreign affairs, the major task confronting the Committee of Detail was to define with precision the expanded powers being conferred on the Federal Government and to allocate these powers among the three branches. The resolutions adopted by the Convention provided the mandate of the committee.

Thus, in approving Madison's resolution to give to Congress the power to dispose of unappropriated lands, the Convention had made an initial commitment to placing the power of transferring land in the whole legislature.

Knowing this, it is not surprising that on August 23, only 5 days after it had passed Madison's resolution, the Convention rejected an amendment providing that no treaty shall be binding which is not ratified by a law. Insofar as any delegate was concerned about the abuse of treaties in disposing of land, they felt secure in the fact that Madison's safeguard had already been referred to the Committee on Detail.

Moreover, Mr. President, there are other grounds on which the Convention may have rejected the amendment. As Madison later states, the rejected proposition was one which would have made the House a participant in making all treaties. But Madison and others recognized that there was a difference between treaties which were complete and final of themselves and others which were incomplete, without implementing law.

By failing to make all treaties subject to the voice of the House, it does not follow that the Convention meant to remove the House from giving its sanction to some treaties.

In this connection, it is relevant to invoke Vattel, the 18th century authority on international law, whose writings were mentioned and relied upon in numerous instances by delegates to the Federal and State conventions.

Vattel's Law of Nations, which is known to have been in the hands of delegates to the Constitutional Convention, stated as a general principle that the very words used by the framers in conferring the treaty power—"to make treaties"—were universally understood to require implementing legislation whenever the conditions of a treaty were of a legislative nature.

According to Vattel, international law held that in all divided governments, the power given to the Executive of making contracts with other nations does not include that of making legislative regulations, but when the contract happens to embrace legislative objects, the assistance of the legislature is necessary to give it effect.

Thus, being well-versed in international law, the framers assumed, without needing to spell it out, that the treaty power was limited by the powers vested in Congress.

The same explanation applies to the vote in the Convention on September 7, when James Wilson proposed to add the House of Representatives to making treaties. By then, the Convention had reaffirmed lodging in Congress the power to dispose of territory, so that there was no longer any need for repeating what was already contained in the Constitution.

IV. STATEMENTS OF FRAMERS AT FEDERAL AND STATE CONVENTIONS SUPPORT EXCLUSIVE POWER OF CONGRESS TO TRANSFER PROPERTY

So much for the votes in the Constitutional Convention. But how was the document explained at the State conventions on approving the Constitution?

Remember, the Constitution was but a lofty piece of paper until it had received the breath of life through acceptance by at least 11 States. The way the Constitution was explained in order to win adherence in the State conventions is an important test of the true meaning of the document.

Actually, there is an abundance of statements by friends of the Constitution, who construed it in the State conventions as being subject to action by the whole Congress whenever it embraced subjects vested in Congress. At the Pennsylvania Convention, James Wilson indicated as much when he drew a parallel between the power of the King of Great Britain and that of the President and Senate, with respect to making treaties. Wilson said:

> In England, if the King and his ministers find themselves, during their negotiations, to be embarrassed, because an existing law is not repealed, or a new law is not enacted, they give notice to the legislature of their situation, and inform them that it will be necessary, before the treaty can operate, that some law be repealed, or some be made.

"And will not the same thing take place here?" Wilson asked.

At the Virginia Convention, Mr. Nicholas made a similar, direct comparison between treaties made in England and treaties made under the Constitution.

Moreover, five delegates to the second and successful North Carolina Convention, Nathan Bryan, James Gillespie, James Holland, Matthew Locke, and Absalom Tatum, each indicated after the convention that they were given the understanding that the treatymaking power was limited by the necessity for enabling legislation whenever treaties involved the enumerated powers of Congress.

For example, James Holland said in 1796 that he would have been opposed to the Constitution except that those in favor of its adoption assured the North Carolina delegates that important subjects which had expressly been given to the Congress would remain secured to the legislature and could not be usurped by treaties.

Consistent with this interpretation of the Constitution, there also is statement made at the Massachusetts Convention by Mr. King. He emphasized that "the treatymaking power would be found as much restrained in this country as in any country in the world." He appears to have reference to the practice in 18th century England, where, as I said earlier, the consent of Parliament was necessary to the completion of a treaty which touched on legislative powers.

Another statement which relates to the Panama Canal Treaty, since it directly involves commerce, was made by Mr. Choate at the Massachusetts Convention. He said that—

> As the regulation of Commerce was under the control of Congress, it could not be regulated by treaty without their consent and concurrence.

There also is strong evidence out of the Virginia Convention to show that the majority who voted for the Constitution believed a treaty could not dispose of Federal property without authority given by the whole Congress. Governor Randolph, who was a delegate both to the Federal and Virginia Conventions, discussed this very issue at his State convention.

In answering the charge by opponents of the Constitution that there is no restriction on making treaties, he replied that the Constitution provided "the most express restriction" on yielding property rights of the Nation in article IV, which is the provision relied upon in the pending amendment by the Senator from Utah.

Randolph was not the only one who took this view at the Virginia Convention. Francis Corbin added that popular rule was secured by the commerce clause.

Corbin said that if property is sought to be transferred by an agreement in the nature of a commercial treaty—a description broad enough to fit a treaty relating to commerce through the Panama Canal—"the consent of the House of Representatives would be requisite, because of the correspondent alterations that must be made in the law."

Mr. President, this view was repeated by so many delegates to the various State conventions on adopting the Constitution as to leave no doubt of the true meaning of our Federal charter. If we will study the past and review what was actually said by the brilliant leaders who wrote and voted for the Constitution, we can learn how they meant for the document to operate.

V. TEXT OF CONSTITUTION PROVES TREATY IS CONDITIONED ON ACTION BY CONGRESS TO DISPOSE OF PROPERTY

But we have more than the statements of the framers. We have even more than the records of the Constitutional Convention. We have the text of the Constitution itself.

Turning to the specific words of the Constitution, I cannot see how anyone can believe that treaties may divest the Congress of its express power to dispose of property.

In the words of Albert Gallatin, one of the political giants of the early years of the Republic:

> The treaty-making power is limited by the Constitution when in the first section of Article I it is said that "All Legislative power" is granted to Congress.

Although the treaty power is expressed in article II without any limitation, the sweeping grant of all the legislative power in article I limits the power of treaties. If a treaty can execute the legislative powers, then Congress has not been vested with all such powers, but only those powers not conferred upon the treatymaking authority.

Moreover, Congress is vested with enumerated powers. As Professor Berger writes:

> There is the settled rule that the specific governs the general.

Berger continues:

> Where there is in an act a specific provision relating to a particular subject, that provision must govern in respect to that subject as against general provisions in other parts of the act. . . .

Thus, Berger concludes, the specific power given Congress to dispose of property governs the general treaty provision.

Mr. President, I am especially persuaded by the reasoning of Professor Berger, since he supports the Panama Canal Treaty. But he insists on the need for enabling legislation since he believes the power of Congress in disposing of property cannot be subverted by a treaty.

Another provision of the Constitution which has a direct bearing on this issue is the necessary and proper clause. This clause declares that—

> Congress shall have power to pass all laws necessary and proper for carrying into execution all powers vested by the Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department or officer thereof.

In 1885, Congressman Tucker, chairman of the House Committee on the Judiciary, submitted a report to the House in which he argued that the language of this clause "makes it clear that while the executory agreement is in the treatymaking power, the power of execution is vested in Congress."

He meant by this that a treaty can agree to act, which would make it executory. But the treaty is not executed until Congress has acted in the case of powers vested in it.

Since the necessary and proper clause gives Congress power to carry into execution the powers vested in any other department of the Government, which includes the treatymaking authority, this clause is consistent with the principle that a treaty agreeing to carry out one of the express legislative powers requires implementing action by Congress. On the other hand, the Constitution would be in conflict among its provisions if it is assumed a treaty can carry into execution the powers vested in Congress.

This interpretation would turn the necessary and proper clause on its head. Such a theory would not only read into the treaty provision a necessary and proper clause where none appears, but it would negate the one clause of this kind which is written into the Constitution by depriving Congress of its proper role in passing laws.

Another argument, which demonstrates the fallacy in the construction of the Constitution made by the State Department, was raised by James Madison in a brilliant speech he delivered in Congress on March 10, 1796. Madison objected that—

> If the treaty power alone could perform any one act for which the authority of Congress is required by the Constitution, it may perform every act for which the authority of that part of the government is required.

If the President and Senate can exercise any of the enumerated powers by treaty alone, Madison said, then they might by means of a treaty make the United States a party to war. He said:

> They might stipulate subsidies and even borrow money to pay for them; they might furnish troops to be carried to Europe, Asia or Africa . . . for the purpose of cooperating, on given contingencies with an ally, for mutual safety, or other common objects.

Those of my colleagues who hold that a treaty alone cannot commit the United States to go to war, without a declaration of war, might do well to heed the warning given by Madison. If they now accept the theory that a self-executing treaty can exercise the express power conferred upon Congress to dispose of property, then what distinction do they make as to the power to declare war?

In 1796, Madison said that if any reasonable line can be drawn, except one arbitrarily made to serve the immediate purposes of the treaty proponents, it ought to be submitted. No answer was given to Madison then, nor have I heard any suggestions by the State Department today as to where it would draw that line.

If we do not halt the treaty-power at the point where it attempts to carry into execution the powers specifically vested in Congress, then as sure as day follows night, we will be setting an open-ended precedent should the Senate advise and consent to the Panama Canal Treaty without conditioning it on enabling legislation.

For example, Congress has power to naturalize citizens. Does this mean a treaty can make hundreds of thousands of immigrants from another area of the world instant citizens the moment they apply for admission to this country?

Can a treaty provide that the German mark shall become the currency of the United States? Can a treaty subject U.S. citizens to an international court and free the decisions of that court from review by our Supreme Court?

All these things could be done by treaty if the theory of the State Department is correct. The absurdity of these propositions illustrates the fallacy in it. There must be reasonable limits on the treaty power or our representative form of government will be replaced with a new system totally alien to the framers.

Mr. President, in closing, I want to address the heavy reliance on Calhoun, Marshall, and Story by those who argue that the Panama Canal Treaty can be self-executing. Over and over, I have heard the other side invoke the name of John C. Calhoun.

John Calhoun has suddenly become the favorite constitutional authority of the State Department. Even many civil rights activists in this body have taken to quoting John Calhoun on the Constitution.

Mr. President, I remind Senators that as brilliant as he was, Calhoun was the author of the nullification theory. He argued that no State was bound by a Federal law which it believed was unconstitutional. It took a domestic war to end that theory.

In 1832, Calhoun resigned as Vice President to enter the Senate to support his nullification theory in Congress. Also, his closing years were marked by strong support of slavery and its extension.

Mr. President, history says that Calhoun was wrong on nullification. He was wrong on slavery. And his novel theory that the treatymaking power can exercise the same powers as Congress was equally wrong.

In fact, Calhoun admits, in the speech most often quoted by the other side, that the treaty authority "has many and powerful limits."

As to John Marshall, I need only mention that when he was Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, Marshall wrote as follows:

> A treaty is, in its nature, a contract between two nations, not a legislative act, and does not generally effect of itself the object to be accomplished, but is carried into execution by the sovereign power of the respected parties to the instrument. In the United States, the Constitution declares a treaty to be the law of the land. It is, consequently, to be regarded in courts of justice as equivalent to an act of the Legislature whenever it operates of itself, without any legislative provision. But when the terms of the stipulation import a contract, when either of the parties engages to perform a particular act, the treaty addresses itself to the political, not the judicial department, and the Legislature must execute the contract before it can become a rule for the court.

So said Marshall in the case of Foster against Neilson.

Mr. President, the Panama Canal Treaty is exactly such a contract as Marshall described. It engages to perform a particular act, the transfer of U.S. property to Panama, and the legislature must execute that agreement before it can be carried into operation.

Finally, Mr. President, I would note that in his famous commentaries on the Constitution, Justice Story specifically declared "the power of Congress over the public territory is clearly exclusive and universal." This is exactly what we are saying, that the power of Congress to dispose of public territory is an exclusive one, and rather than challenge our position, Story actually confirms it.

Thus, Mr. President, none of the three major authorities relied on by the other side stands up upon close examination.

Mr. President, I urge support for the pending amendment.

In closing, I state again what I stated at the outset and what I feel that many of us wander away from in this very prolonged, sometimes pleasant, sometimes unpleasant, debate on the Panama Canal treaties: Those of us who are opposing this treaty oppose it on a simple ground—the Constitution—because it requires an action by a treaty to first agree with a foreign country to dispose of property. After that happens, it requires a statute to complete that transfer. It takes both.

Mr. President, I was most happy to receive a communication from the State Department, a rather belated one, a rather lengthy one, indicating that they, too, believe that this legislation is necessary.

So I hope that my colleagues in this body will support this approach. I see nothing wrong in keeping within the bounds of our Constitution.

Mr. President, I relinquish the floor.

(Mr. SARBANES assumed the chair.)

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I congratulate the senior Senator from Arizona, a revered figure in this Chamber and in this Nation, for the character and the quality of his address. It is not the first time that the senior Senator from Arizona has risen in this Chamber or in the political forums of our Nation to speak to constitutional matters, only to find that persons such as myself have not agreed with him and only to have those persons years later wish they might have listened more closely. Evidently, this will continue to be the case. It will be so on this occasion, in any event.

This Chamber cannot have heard, in this debate or in any other debate, many such careful and thoughtful and reasoned expositions of a powerfully important position. The Senator from Arizona speaks to the integrity of the constitutional provisions which inform our behavior and which constitute our mandate. He spoke splendidly.

If, on a matter of close decision, others do not share his vital judgment, surely none will deny the extraordinary authority with which he has set it forth.

Mr. GOLDWATER. I thank my good friend from New York for those very kind words.

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, will the Senator from New York yield?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. The Senator from New York is happy to yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. NUNN. I thank my distinguished colleague from New York.

The subject I am about to address has nothing at all to do with the Panama Canal. Because of the impending decision on the neutron bomb, I wish to address myself to that issue for about 4 or 5 minutes, if the Senator will yield me that much time.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I am happy to do so.

(At this point in the proceedings there was a colloquy concerning the neutron bomb, which is printed subsequently in today's RECORD.)

Mr. MOYNIHAN. Mr. President, I would like, having stated the great regard with which any Member of this Senate would have listened to the address of the Senator from Arizona, nonetheless to respond to his points with an equal conviction that however ably they were presented they are not sufficiently persuasive. This has to do with the responsibility of the Senate in regard to property transfer, and it goes, Mr. President, to an experience of a century's standing in which a clear understanding as between the Senate and the Executive has emerged as to just what these responsibilities are and how they are to be executed.

Mr. President, for over a century, no serious question has been raised with respect to the authority of the President and the Senate to transfer U.S. property through the treatymaking process.

Let me just repeat it because it is so important: For over a century no serious question has been raised with respect to the authority of the President and the Senate to transfer property through the treatymaking process.

The text of the Constitution, the history of the constitutional debates, the decisions of the courts, all make it perfectly clear that the Senate and the President have the full power to dispose of property through a self-executing treaty such as the one now before us.

Perhaps, more importantly, the Senate and the President, working together, have entered into numerous treaties doing just that, disposing of U.S. property in the normal activities of a major nation with interests all around the world, which interests change from time to time, from decade to decade.

As recently as 1971, the Senate gave its advice and consent to the treaty with Japan relinquishing large amounts of U.S. property on the island of Okinawa to Japan.

In that same year the Senate gave its advice and consent to a treaty with Nicaragua relinquishing any U.S. rights to construct a canal in that country, clearly a property right, and U.S. leasehold rights over the Corn Islands.

Again in 1971, the Senate gave its advice and consent to a treaty relinquishing U.S. property on the Swan Islands to Honduras.

At that time no Member of the Senate or of the House raised any question as to the power of the Senate and the President through the treatymaking process to take these actions.

What is there to distinguish these treaties from the Panama Canal Treaty, the treaty immediately before us?

Mr. President, there is none. The Okinawa Treaty, like the Panama Canal Treaty, involved millions of dollars worth of property, and certainly no one would contend that Okinawa is not of strategic importance to the United States.

Both the Okinawa Treaty and the treaty with Nicaragua relinquished jurisdiction and authority over territory, just as the proposed treaty would do, but no one argued that these treaties required the approval of the House. The Senate and the present executive pattern had been established for over a century.

Why then is this issue being resurrected at this late date suddenly in connection with this treaty? What are the differences that really animate and explain this event?

I suggest it is not because there is any serious legal or constitutional issue involved; not because the House would be deprived of any of its legitimate legislative powers under the Constitution. Rather, I submit, this issue has been raised simply because those who do not approve the treaty believe they may not be able to prevail on the merits of the treaties themselves and are understandably attempting to obtain a second chance since they cannot defeat the treaties in the Senate, hoping to do so in the House.

We can admire the ingenuity of the effort and respect the dedication to their point of view which it involves. But we ought not to be swayed by the argument that not only allows but indeed requires us to avoid our own responsibilities as Senators.

The Constitution clearly and specifically places the power to make treaties in the hands of the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. There are, perhaps, no words in the Constitution relating to the Senate which are better known and, if I may suggest, better understood.

This is a weighty responsibility. As Senators we are required to study the merits and the demerits of treaties proposed by the President, and to give our advice and consent based on our own judgments as to our national interests.

In the case of the treaties that are as controversial as those before us, this admittedly places us in a difficult position. We all know there are those who are strongly against treaties as well as those who are strongly for them, but we cannot take the way out of our own responsibilities by asking that they be executed elsewhere. We, in this Chamber, must stand and advise and consent to the ratification of these treaties or not.

Mr. President, it seems to me that in the midst of this diversion with which we are now dealing—I wish to say, a perfectly legitimate and understandable diversion, but one which we nonetheless regard as that—it may be useful to come back for a moment to the question of what is at stake in this debate. What will be determined by the success or failure of the treaties? It is an appropriate time to do so because only last evening the President of the United States returned from a trip to Latin America and a trip to Africa, the first trip to that continent in the history of the Presidency. The President had a strong personal success, as one would expect and hope, in each of the four countries he visited, for he is a man of transparent integrity and good will. Nonetheless, everywhere the President went he found a cloud cast over the efforts he made to establish America's concern for those parts of the world in our desire to see them treated equally as nations, as equal members of the family of nations. The cloud, the mist that somehow obscures the vision of what we would have of our own purposes is the still hanging uncertainty of a colonialist and imperialist past which we and all the major nations of the Northern Hemisphere seem to have acquired, but which we are now at last divesting. This leaves the Soviet Union, in its imperial purposes, still more blatantly and glaringly exposed for the conquering power it is and proposes to be.

In this afternoon's Washington Star, Mr. Henry Bradsher, who accompanied the President on his trip, and who is one of the most distinguished diplomatic journalists of our time, writes a long story over which the headline is "Credibility Gap Sours Carter Trip."

In particular, he notes that in Nigeria, in Lagos, in the long conferences the President had there, in which the President called for an Africa free of foreign interposition and foreign troops, meaning the Cuban "Afrika Korps" deployed, supported, and wholly subsurvient to the imperial purposes of the Soviet Union, moving about Africa, killing and maiming as it goes, destroying the efforts at self-asertion of independence and territorial integrity of the peoples of Angola, associating itself under the direction of General Petrov, the commanding general of Soviet land forces, first in the war in the Ogudan, now in Ethiopia on the part of the Central Goverment in Eritrea—somehow our call for the end of European imperialism in Africa got no response.

Now, there is more involved than just the negotiations involving the Panama Canal, and I do not for a moment suggest that our ratification of the treaty would have a decisive effect; but how long a day will it be when, with clean hands and an absolutely open record, the United States can finally ask the rest of the world to confront the fact of Soviet imperialism?

If I might introduce a personal note, it was on the 12th of August last year that I announced my own support for these treaties, calling them an extraordinary feat of diplomacy, as they were and as I believe this debate has shown them to be. I said this not with the thought that they were of such perfection that their improvement could not be imagined, but rather because the treaties give to us important rights, advantages, and privileges—and give them to us in a form that we might be able to retain them for many years to come. The treaties offer a reasonable expectation that the position of the United States with respect to the Panama Canal can indeed be sustained over the long run. It seems to me that the existing agreements, concluded 75 years ago in 1903—whatever their advantages in specific content—will not, cannot, endure into the next century at a cost which the American polity is prepared to bear.

It is my simple view that if we want the use of this canal in the circumstances that these treaties support, we should ratify these treaties; otherwise we will not find the Nation willing to put up with them.

For what will the public opinion polls show with regard to maintaining our position in Panama when we are fighting a guerrilla war there? This body has had some experience with that sort of response from the public.

Moreover, Mr. President, I have reached the conclusion that the general approach to the future of the canal as embodied in these treaties has been so much a part of American foreign policy for 20 or so years, so bound up with every American President really since the time of Franklin Roosevelt, that the rejection of the treaties by the Senate is unimaginable, an act that would be so at variance with the broad consensus that sustained American foreign policy for the past generation—and which must be continued if we are to have even the semblance of a foreign policy in the future—as to be an event of seismic character.

This is so, precisely because of the historic Senate responsibility to provide advice and consent. For in no small measure, the very terms of these treaties show the influence of Senate "advice" not only in recent years, but in recent months. If the treaties on the floor of the Senate today are sounder in meaning—and with the ratification of the first treaty with the amendments offered by the joint leadership we must certainly agree they are much sounder in meaning—and destined to be sounder in language as well, that is only because of the will of the Senate, and the role of the Senate in this process is not only intact but is more powerful in consequence.

And if the opponents of these treaties are yet not content to claim the credit they too deserve for these improvements—and indeed offer the contrary view that these improvements are no improvement at all in order that they may continue to oppose the treaties as such, it falls to us who support the treaties to make the most of their generosity. And, in particular, we must ponder the consequences of withholding ratification from documents which we, in no small measure, have created.

With all this, one could still imagine a basis for the rejection of a treaty negotiated by the President, based on a negotiating position informed by the best advice of the Senate and even of the House of Representatives. One could indeed imagine it—if there emerged in the course of the discussion of such a treaty a compelling argument, a new set of facts, or even a startling development on the world scene which might have rendered nugatory the very premises which underlay that treaty's negotiation. But such has not occurred these past months, nor is it likely to do so in the months ahead.

Instead, we are in what I believe to be the 9th week of debate on these treaties, Mr. President, with a growing sense of the certainty of their ratification. But I believe that the public's certain drift away from the political and strategic issues this debate was designed to illuminate, if such a thing should happen, perhaps is inevitable in the consideration of an issue which has evoked an uncommonsense of seriousness and perhaps even severity among proponents and opponents alike. And, we must acknowledge further that our debates are governed by rules of procedure and parliamentary precedent almost centuries in the making. It is, therefore, not surprising that the effort to enlist such procedures and precedents as an ally in debate will lead to a mode of presentation somewhat different from that compelled by mere argument and rhetoric alone.

I am struck further, Mr. President, by the historic proportions these deliberations have now assumed as against the issues we in fact deliberate. This is one of the great treaty debates of the century—but can we say that the stakes, or the commitment, embodied in these treaties approach those of Versailles, nor even of the North Atlantic Treaty of 1949? In this last case, the Senate ratified an undertaking of the most profound importance, an undertaking unprecedented in our history—the creation of a permanent alliance, a permanent "foreign entanglement" of the sort our history had made traditionally suspect and seemingly dangerous—and that treaty, the North Atlantic Treaty, on which we may say our security as a democracy so much depends, was ratified on July 9, 1949, after having been debated for 12 days.

I offer this contrast, not in criticism, but rather as a form of apology. Is there that much more to be learned about the treaties before us—do we not already know more about the Panama Canal than most persons in ordinary circumstances would care to know—so that an additional address on the subject can be taken as a wholly gratuitous effort to maintain the floor throughout the afternoon? Indeed, let us be honest and say that we come close upon that point where rhetoric appears either tedious or tenacious—or both—especially when, for parliamentary purposes which some of us can scarcely absorb, the traditional injunctions about brevity seem inappropriate. I speak to do my duty by these treaties, as but one Senator in the cause so ably led by both the majority and minority leaders and by virtually every member of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee. I propose to add neither to the general data base so laboriously built up in support of the treaties, nor to the results of the legal reasoning which has been so cogently applied in elucidation and explanation of the treaties' terms, nor even to the fruits of the linguistic analysis which have been applied to problems of translation and grammar and—with deference to my dear friend the junior Senator from California—even semantics.

Yet, Mr. President, I believe that I can offer a different perspective on this matter, for each of us comes to this body with differing experiences, with differing habits of thought built up from ones previous profession or business, indeed, with differing stocks of information. In my own case, I have had the opportunity to represent the United States as Ambassador, first in India, later at the United Nations. I hope these experiences have contributed something of value in evaluating certain aspects of these treaties.

At the outset, I said that my support for these treaties rests on the fact that they provide us with important and beneficial rights and in a manner such that we have a reasonable expectation that we will be able to exercise and derive benefits from those rights over a long period of time. Not the least of these is an important, indeed decisive, role for the United States in the future evolution of the Panama Canal. These treaties establish a close relationship between the United States and the Republic of Panama not merely for the rest of this century, but perhaps indefinitely or as much as men can know what will be indefinite.

Panama acquires control of the canal at the end of the century, and as the price for the acquisition of this assest—as valuable as any asset can be to Panama, in that the isthmus is the only resource in Panama of substantial value, assuming that it remains developed—Panama acknowledges that the canal is a unique strategic entity for the United States, a point and a place of special sensitivity to the United States, such that we could not transfer ownership of the canal without maintaining for ourselves an exclusive right to insure that the canal is never used against us. For as much as we can attempt to determine the value of the canal, 10, 20, 30 years hence, there is in it a value of denial to potential or actual enemies. I should think that a fair reading of the Neutrality Treaty indicates that we can act to preserve what is euphemistically called the "regime of neutrality," that is to say, a regime of nonhostility to the United States of America.

On February 23, I engaged in interesting discussions on the floor with the senior Senator from Nebraska (Mr. CURTIS), who is so respected in this Chamber, and with my new friend and good friend the junior Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH), who is the author of the amendment now before us.

I brought to that enterprise the very substantial support of the junior Senator from Maryland (Mr. SARBANES), who expertise in these matters is now nationally known, and with the senior Senator from Idaho (Mr. CHURCH), the second-ranking Democrat on the Foreign Relations Committee. I offered then two propositions which I wish today to amplify. First I offered the thought that one large achievement of the canal negotiations was to provide a continued U.S. presence in Panama, and thereafter a continued U.S. relationship which has and would have broad hemispheric and international support—whereas there was no longer any of either for the present arrangement. Second, I sought to relate this startling turnabout in the position of the United States in this matter—from a position of general opposition to one of general support—to the position of the United States in world politics as a whole. And here, I believe the major point to note is that this significant reversal is not the result of unwarranted concessions or of retreat, but rather that the treaties properly understood and exploited, will soon be seen as a turning point, a point of advance, a supreme ascension of America's future purpose and role.

It is important to note that the strategic dilemmas of today's world owe much to the force of American political ideology. The retreat of the European powers from their old colonial dominions—a process, surely, made inevitable by the exhaustion of their substance in two intra-European wars—was nonetheless hastened by American insistence that colonial regimes give way to self-government democratically organized. There is but one European power, and President Carter spoke about this yesterday in Africa, one caucasian power, still committed to the old imperialism, to the imposition of caucasian rule by force over noncaucasian peoples, prepared to import foreign mercenaries to expand its imperial interests. That single power is, of course, the Soviet Union, which seeks now to fill some presumed vacuum of power in Africa especially, but also in Asia or Latin America—wherever it feels it can gain ascendency on the cheap, or at least at the expense of other people's lives and substance. If many in the so-called Third World still seem unwilling to see the new Soviet imperialism for what it is, the more, then, ought we to stress the uniqueness of Soviet behavior in today's world.

The United States is a great power, of course, and requires for the defense of its interests and of the interests of the world's democracies with which it is allied, certain prerogatives and, if you will, privileges. In each case, those prerogatives derive from the consent of any country which chooses to afford them to us. That consent grows out of the perception of a common interest. In Europe or in Japan or in Australia, the United States finds hospitality and receptivity precisely, because it has been able to establish a common interest worthy of a joint enterprise.

Let us be honest and say that since, 1903, the same cannot be said of our relationship with Panama. This does not mean that we have mistreated or expropriated or repressed or otherwise extorted from the people of Panama that which otherwise would have been theirs were it not for our presence and our actions. Rather, it is merely to say that our relationship with Panama does not meet the same tests of legitimacy we customarily apply in our common strategic and economic undertakings with other countries. Nor does it meet the tests the world as a whole has come to apply, tests it has, incidentally, come to apply in the past 30 years in the main because of our insistence.

This is a fact, and the argument that we should somehow resist for ourselves the implication of Wilsonian principles of self-determination which now prevail in almost the whole of the world outside the sphere of influence of the Soviet Union, when it comes to Panama may have a certain plausibility, but certainly no forthright persuasion. And yet that argument is nonetheless made, however flawed.

It offers an impossibility. It offers an irrecoverable world, a world premodern in the basic sense. In short: We can no doubt maintain the 1903 arrangements by force, for our force is sufficient; if we can convince ourselves that there is some higher necessity for so doing. But we must face the fact that such a policy is untenable over the longer run, perhaps even in the immediate future. And I believe that the broad support that the modernization of the Panamanian arrangements has enjoyed across the political spectrum, from among all the past war Presidents, from the time of Franklin D. Roosevelt, grows out of a recognition of these facts.

One measure of the success of the treaty negotiations is seen in another important respect, for the conclusion of the treaties has reduced the question of Panama to more appropriate proportions. In the past dozen years, the future of the canal, an issue in Panamanian-American bilateral relations, had been transformed into a broad international issue with a pointed anti-American character. The future of the canal became a not insignificant issue in what might be called world "ideological politics."

How is it that the canal came to intrude into the world's political agenda? We recall that in January 1972, the Security Council of the United Nations convened for the first time away from its headquarters in New York. Interestingly, in light of recent events, it sat in Addis Ababa, the capital of a country then enjoying a relative measure of tranquility—not yet the base of operations for Soviet expansionism and for the deployment of the Cuban Africa Corps under the command of Soviet generals it has now become. In any event, it was arranged in that meeting that the Security Council would meet the following year, in March of 1973, in Panama City.

That Security Council meeting 5 years ago shows the extent to which at that time we had lost control of the terms of reference of the discussion. For example, invited to participate in the council's discussion, but without the right to vote, were an additional 25 countries including such non-Western Hemisphere countries as Algeria, Mauritania, Zaire, and Zambia. Cuba was also invited. Cuba invariably sought to link the issue of the Panama Canal Zone to that of Puerto Rico as dual instances of "American imperialism"; the United States presence in Panama had never been sanctioned by the Panamanian people, the Cuban delegate would assert, and neither had our presence in Puerto Rico, despite repeated emphatic democratic elections in that Commonwealth.

The Security Council's Report A/19002 summarizes what the Cuban representative had to say:

> . . . The main item on the agenda was the threat to international peace and security in the hemisphere that lay in neo-colonial relations imposed on Panama by the United States under a treaty that infringed and violated the most elementary norms of international law. Cuba considered that the perpetuity of that neo-colonial agreement should be abrogated, and the concessions as well, because there had been no free consent. The will of the United States had been imposed without the approval of the Panamanian people. As the neo-colonial enclave was affecting the sovereignty and territorial integrity of Panama, full enjoyment of its inherent powers over the entire territory of the Isthmus must be returned to that country. . . . The hour had already struck when all forms and manifestations of colonialism and neo-colonialism in Latin America must be wiped out, including the Associated Free State of Puerto Rico, the seditious activities of transnational enterprises and the naval base of Guantanamo, a part of Cuba's national territory taken over against the express will of its people and used after the triumph of the Cuban revolution as a nest for counter-revolutionaries and spies. It was up to the Security Council to set the political and juridical framework that would guarantee recognition, obedience and respect for the sovereign rights of Panama in its negotiations with the United States regarding the Canal Zone. The alternative was clear-cut and final: either the Canal and the Canal Zone were made Panamanian and Latin America was allowed to be freed and developed or peace and security would be increasingly endangered in that part of the world.

Interesting words from the representative of a government which has placed thousands of its soldiers at the service of the only remaining old-fashioned imperial power in the world, the Soviet Union. Yet they clearly indicate the capacity of those nations to think in terms of direct military aggression and, in this case, it would be military aggression in which the whole world would hold our position to be illegitimate, and theirs to be sanctioned by international usage. This possibility disappears altogether, Mr. President, not ever to reappear, when this second treaty has been ratified by the Senate and implemented by the two nations.

It is an important fact that, in the past 5 years, the terms of reference so arrogantly protruded by Cuba—which is to say the Soviet Union— redound increasingly to the disadvantage of the totalitarian powers. The Security Council met in Panama as part of a scheme to isolate the United States in this hemisphere, to link Latin American issues with so-called Third World issues so as to organize overwhelming international majorities against the position of the United States—especially in Panama. That policy, seen today, is a failure.

Are we to say that our diplomacy had nothing to do with this reversal? Ought we deny ourselves whatever measure of satisfaction our own handiwork deserves? I reiterate my basic point: the ratification of these treaties will underscore the isolation of Castro and Castroism in this hemisphere, will highlight the bizarre adventure of Soviet-Cuban imperialism in Africa, will in sum derive for the United States a continued strategic and political position in the Isthmus. But it will be a position supported by those very States which others had sought to turn against us on this issue.

Let us recognize that these treaties are a worthy result of a long and difficult negotiation, a result which preserves for us important and substantive interests, and a result which also has strengthened the institutional role of the Senate while allowing the President the opportunity he needs to conduct foreign policy with a reasonable base of domestic support.

It is so important to understand that when these treaties are behind us, a new period is ahead of us. We become the spokesman for the Wilsonian principles of self-determination, of independence, which we ought to be, which we have been, but whose words have been blurred to those who might have wished to hear them and have been ignored by those who do not wish to, because of this one remaining legacy of a long-since-used-up past.

Mr. President, in closing I should like to introduce into the record a statement by the Liberal Party of New York State on the subject of the Panama Canal treaties entitled "Justice and Fair Play." I do not suppose there is a political group in this Nation which can claim as honorable an attachment to the principles that Franklin D. Roosevelt brought to this Nation and this world than the Liberal Party of New York State. It has produced an exceptionally persuasive, concise, compelling statement of why the good neighbor policy, known across the world and respected throughout this hemisphere, can have as one of its shining monuments in this decade, four decades after it was propounded by Franklin Roosevelt, the approval of these treaties by the United States and their ratification by the two nations involved.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the complete text of the Liberal Party's statement be printed in the RECORD.

(Mr. RIEGLE assumed the chair).

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I thank the Chair.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JUSTICE AND FAIR PLAY IN PANAMA

(A Statement on the Panama Canal Treaties by the New York State Liberal Party)

The Liberal Party of New York State, committed to the principles of justice and fair play, calls on the Senate of the United States to honor these principles by giving its assent to the Panama Canal Treaty and the Treaty Concerning the Neutrality and Operation of the Panama Canal.

At stake are four critical issues—the maturity of the American people in a rapidly changing world, the consistency with which we apply the same standards to our own behavior as we do to others, the security of the United States, and equity for Panama.

The United States is confronted with a test of its maturity in the conduct of its relations with other nations. Britain, France, Netherlands, Belgium, Portugal and other European countries with a far larger stake in their colonial possessions have already demonstrated, albeit with varying degrees of reluctance, that they have reached maturity in the post-war era. We are now being asked to give up a colonial outpost no longer vital to our economic or security needs in a country whose people are no longer willing to accept external domination.

Twenty years ago, while protesting Egypt's nationalization of the Suez Canal, we prevented Britain and France from restoring international control of the Canal, and we accepted the principle of Egyptian ownership and management. We must be consistent, applying the same standards to our own behavior with the Panama Canal.

Those whose role in our national government is to be forceful advocates of protecting our national security—the Secretary of Defense and the Joint Chief of Staff—have asserted that "these treaties fully serve and greatly promote our national security interests." (Testimony of Harold Brown before the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, September 27, 1977; emphasis added.)

The proposed treaties go at least part of the way in establishing greater equity in our relations with the Republic of Panama. Last year, Panama received $2.3 million for the lease of some 550 square miles of the Canal Zone, on which there are fourteen military bases. That same year, Spain received $20 million from the United States for leasing land for three military bases.

The United States has deprived Panama of a fair return on its principal economic asset—strategic geographical location—and preempted the use of some of the choicest land within that small country.

Even more important than economic considerations is the United States' denial under present treaty arrangements of the principle of political fairness. "It does not," commented a Panamanian civic leader in a letter to a U.S. magazine recently, "feel good at all when your country is divided in two by a ten-mile-wide zone in which your language is not spoken, your laws are not applied, and your country is not your country."

The issue of political fairness extends the implications of our action on the proposed treaties far beyond our relations with Panama. What we do with respect to Panama will have an enormous effect upon our future relations with the rest of Latin America. Any future relationship with Cuba will be vitally affected by what we do with Panama. The question is whether we are going to continue the Good Neighbor Policy with respect to Latin America. Perhaps more important still, nations throughout the world and especially those of the Third World, are watching closely to see whether we will apply our own rhetoric to ourselves and be true to our anti-colonial heritage and our commitment to human freedom and national independence.

The opponents of the treaties are noisy, well-heeled and well-organized. Using jingoism of the worst sort in their appeals to a distorted sense of American patriotism, they appear to be less interested in the treaties themselves than in using the cause to engineer a conservative take-over of the Republican Party. Their case centers around four false arguments:

1. The United States gave Panama its independence. (Not so. The Panamanians tried over fifty times to assert their independence from Colombia in the nineteenth century. We assisted when they finally succeeded in 1903 but did not create their desire for independence.)

2. The 1903 treaty gave the United States sovereignty over the Canal Zone. (Not so, again! That treaty gave "rights," not "ownership.")

3. The Canal Zone is essential to our economy and security. (Not so. Less than one percent of our Gross National Product is affected by the Canal, and only sixteen percent of United States international trade uses the Canal. The importance of the Canal is outdated today. The Secretary of Defense and the Joint Chiefs of Staff do not think the Canal is vital to the security of the United States.)

4. The proposed treaties are a "giveaway." (On the contrary. The 1903 treaty was a giveaway by Panama to the United States!)

One other argument is sometimes used by the treaty opponents: We should not give a monopoly to Panama by agreeing not to be a party to constructing a competing canal. The alternative most frequently mentioned is a sea-level canal through Columbia, the so-called Route 25. But Colombia is a sovereign country and the United States has no monopoly on the necessary international finance or engineering skills.

If the Liberal Party is critical at all of the proposed treaties, it is because they do not fully meet the test of political fairness. By giving the United States rights of access in perpetuity, the new treaties constitute a significant abridgement of Panama's sovereignty. The fact that a third of the Panamanian people voted no in the recent referendum on the treaties is a reflection of this fact. But we recognize the need for compromise in balancing conflicting interests internationally and domestically, and therefore urge speedy Senate approval of the treaties.

President Torrijos is not our ideal of a political leader, but that is no argument against Senate approval of the treaties. The Panamanians must work out their own political destiny for themselves. The sooner the United States eliminates its colonial presence in Panama, with the continuing temptation to manipulate Panamanian political choice, the better.

The 1903 treaty is an intolerable anachronism which debases our American principles of justice and fair play, and makes a mockery of our support of human freedom in Southern Africa and elsewhere.

The conservative opponents to the 1977 treaties are seventy-five years out of date with a rapidly changing world.

In urging prompt Senate approval of the 1977 treaties, the Liberal Party of New York State calls upon all objective, sane, responsible political forces and right-thinking people throughout the United States to join with it in the fight for treaty approval by rededicating themselves to the time-honored American ideals of justice and fair play.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. MOYNIHAN. The Senator is happy to yield to the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. I thank the very able junior Senator from New York (Mr. MOYNIHAN) for an extremely thoughtful and perceptive statement, and in particular, for his emphasis on two things. One is the opportunity which these treaties open up to the United States, not only in terms of establishing a fair relationship between ourselves and Panama, but in terms of what the United States will stand for in that part of the world and, indeed, elsewhere in the world; and the contrast, then, that we can develop between how America seeks to base its relationship with small nations, such as Panama, and the approach which the Soviet Union takes to its relationships with nations around the world. Contrast, if you will, the brutal aggression by the Soviet Union in Czechoslovakia and in Hungary to establish their interests, without any legal or moral basis, clear and simple aggression, with this effort on the part of the United States to establish a relationship with Panama based on equity and fairness and justice as embodied in these treaties, treaties which protect our interest and protect the interests of the Republic of Panama and the people of Panama. It seems to me that that contrast and the opportunity for us to establish that contrast in the thinking of peoples across the world gives us a chance here to carry forward the Wilsonian and the good neighbor principles which the Senator from New York has spoken about so eloquently.

(The following occurred later in today's proceedings and are printed at this point by unanimous consent.)

Mr. SARBANES. Will the Senator yield for a moment?

Mr. CHURCH. I am happy to yield to my distinguished colleague, the Senator from Maryland.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, earlier today in the course of the debate, the very able and distinguished Senator from New York (Mr. MOYNIHAN) made a very perceptive, thoughtful, and eloquent address, concerning the meaning of these treaties to the United States position not only on Panama and Latin America, but, indeed, throughout the world.

I would like to briefly make reference to the welcoming statement given by Venezuelan President Carlos Andres Perez on the arrival of President and Mrs. Carter in Venezuela on their trip. I hope Members will pay close attention. It will take only a moment or two.

We have heard the contention made on the floor of the Senate by some opponents of the treaties that the people of Latin America, the leaders of the Latin American countries, do not really care whether these treaties are approved. We have had it suggested that the treaties could be rejected and we could still maintain close and friendly relationships with the Latin American countries. Opponents of the treaties have downplayed, their significance in Latin America.

President Perez said the following:

We Venezuelans receive your visit with profound pleasure. President Carter and his wife have stood out as two genuine standard bearers of the cause of universal democracy, which makes it especially satisfying for Venezuela that our fatherland should be the first one you visit in Latin America, Mr. President.

You have come to Latin America at a time in which all our people have their eyes and ears upon the U.S. Congress. The Senate is discussing the future of hemispheric relations between South America and North America. Every word said there on the ratification of the new Panama Canal treaties has deep repercussions in all countries of Latin America. When we, the government leaders of Latin America, were in Washington in the headquarters of the Organization of American States, all of our people, without distinction as to race, belief or origin of their governments, supported the documents signed by you and the Panamanian chief of government, Gen. Omar Torrijos. Not since the entrance into World War II by the United States had the people of Latin America expressed such unanimous and enthusiastic support as that which they gave these treaties signed by you, the chiefs of government of the United States and Panama.

This means that that day, 7 September 1977, is marked in the history of the hemisphere as the date in which resentments were erased and a historic era ended. [They] were erased as they had been earlier between the United States and England or between Latin America and Spain. Such is the immense meaning of those treaties in the context of the friendship and fraternity between our peoples.

The President of Venezuela then continued in his welcoming speech to President Carter at the Simon Bolivar Airport in Venezuela:

We have confidence in the American spirit and the democratic justice of the U.S. Senate. Republicans and Democrats represent a great people who identify their existence with the struggle for freedom, the dignity of peoples and their sovereign rights which they were the first to champion when they proclaimed their independence in 1776.

I say all this, Mr. President, interpreting the feelings of the Latin American people with full optimism but without being able to hide the sincere concern we throughout Latin America feel toward any congressional action which may detour the noble route of this gallant initiative, the emblem of the U.S. bicentennial, which we Latin Americans joyously celebrated just as we want to celebrate with the same fraternal joy the ratification of the new treaties, which will be the initiation of a new era of friendship and cooperation between Latin America and the United States. Such is the symbolic meaning of the new Panama Canal treaties. Not only will this be a ratification of a new, just and honorable treaty of sovereignty, but also a ratification of the eternal friendship between the United States and Latin America.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that my comments, and my colloquy related to the statement of the President of Venezuela which I have just read to the Senate, be included in the RECORD immediately after the colloquy with the distinguished Senator from New York (Mr. MOYNIHAN) in which he spoke of how important these treaties were for America's position throughout the world.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Maryland for having read into the record the statement by President Perez of Venezuela. Venezuela is one of the most important democratic governments in the Western Hemisphere. I think the statement of President Perez adds eloquent testimony to the strong endorsement given these treaties by the governments of Latin America.

(This concludes proceedings which occurred later in the day.)

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I thank the Senator and would just confirm his impression of what I have said.

The Senator knows, no American of Greek ancestry could not know, this is a dangerous world. If one is not prepared to fight for what he has, he might find he does not have it any more, that armed force is a reality, and that the forces of the totalitarian expansion exist in the world. With every day we find some new effort, some new Soviet weapon, some new Soviet expeditionary force.

There is no question in the minds of the proponents of these treaties of withdrawing from the world. We cannot withdraw. We can lose our rights, we can lose our strength, we can lose our importance in the world, but we cannot get out of it.

The President of the United States was not withdrawing from the world in Venezuela, Brazil, Nigeria, Liberia. He is asserting that we are still out there.

But how difficult, curious, and shortsighted on the part of other nations that they will still look to whatever excuse they can find to avoid the reality of what they see as a greater Soviet threat.

What these treaties do is get rid of the unfinished business of the middle half of the 20th century so we can focus on the serious problems of totalitarian expansion in the rest of the world.

Nobody on this side of the treaties, nobody on both sides of the aisle, of course, has any thought of withdrawing from the world. Our concern is with an effective and respected American voice in the world. A big country that can get rid of a small problem like this is a country that can do anything—nobody can do everything, but we can do large and serious things worthy of the American respect.

We are here not just to handle this not very important technical matter. We are here to show what kind of people we are and what kind of country we propose to continue to be and what kind of influence we hope to have in the world in the generations ahead.

Mr. President, I thank the Chair and the Senator from Maryland for his thoughtful and friendly remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Who yields time?

Mr. HATCH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas had a statement at this point, but I am not quite sure where he is.

Mr. MOYNIHAN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. As the Senator from Kansas does not appear to be on the scene, I would like to take the opportunity to extend my own remarks for just a moment in view of the fact that the junior Senator from Utah is on the floor.

I have been speaking of the President's visit to Africa, of his warnings against the Cuban mercenaries, of which he spoke, of the failure of his Nigerian hosts to provide any reciprocal suggestion that they agreed with the President's views about the need to free Africa of Soviet aggression.

Over the weekend I had the great pleasure of reading an extensive review essay, as I believe they are called in academic life, in a new journal of international affairs in which the Senator from Utah reviewed five books on the situation in Southern Africa. He did so with clarity, with conciseness and a view which will be persuasive to a great many persons.

He points to the needs of the United States to maintain a viable position in that role in the world and the Soviet purpose that we should not do so.

I have been so persuaded by his argument, yet I thought he would immediately recognize the direct connection between African developments and the impediment which the old Panama treaties impose on the pursuit of a larger, certainly more noble, and incontestably more contemporary undertaking.

Mr. HATCH. I certainly thank the distinguished Senator from New York for his expression.

I always enjoy his friendship, and I certainly am his friend.

I do see some differences, however, in the review of the books and the Panama Canal. However, I do appreciate the contrary opinions of the distinguished Senator from New York.

I want to compliment him for his comments here today, even though we are on opposite sides of this question.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, I believe the Senator from Kansas is on the floor. I understand he wishes to speak now.

Mr. DOLE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Kansas.

Mr. DOLE. Mr. President, I, unfortunately, have not had an opportunity to listen to much of the debate the past 2 or 3 days. Many of us have been working on legislation to help America's farmers. I suggest that we are on the threshold of accomplishing that end, hopefully, by tomorrow at this time there will be some conference agreed to which will present the American farmers, and I might add the American consumers, with an opportunity which we believe should be accepted, and we believe should be adopted by the Senate, by the House and signed by the White House. That is the new concept in farm programs known as flexible parity.

So, for that reason, Mr. President, I have not had the opportunity to listen to the distinguished junior Senator from Utah, or other Members of this body who debate what I consider one of the important amendments to this treaty.

Mr. President, I support this effort to reaffirm the constitutional responsibility of the House of Representatives to participate in transfer of ownership of the Panama Canal Zone territory. Certainly, this discussion is one of the most significant aspects of the canal treaty debate. The resolution of this issue has important ramifications, not only for this treaty, but as a precedent for similar proposals in the future.

The source of confusion arises because of two separate sections of the U.S. Constitution which contradict each other under the present circumstances. It has already been made abundantly clear in the course of this discussion, but I will briefly reiterate:

Article II, Section 2 of the Constitution states that the President "shall have power, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators present concur . . ."

Article IV, Section 3 of the Constitution states, with respect to the transfer of United States property: "the Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States . . ."

Mr. President, last September, the Senator from Kansas proposed a reservation to the Panama Canal Treaty to reaffirm the role of the House of Representatives in the transfer of our property in the Panama Canal Zone. Reservation No. 2, offered by the Senator from Kansas on September 23, states that, before the canal treaty enters into force, "the Congress" must adopt appropriate legislation to transfer the Canal Zone to the Republic of Panama. I feel at this time, as I did then, that this type of approach would protect the right and the responsibility of the House of Representatives to participate in this significant decision.

JUDICIAL PRECEDENT

One of the principal issues in this debate has been the question of whether the Canal Zone is, in fact, American territory.

U.S. title to the Canal Zone property has been affirmed on several occasions by the highest courts in our land. In 1907, the Supreme Court, by unanimous decision, confirmed our clear title to the Canal Zone property:

It is hypercritical to contend that the title of the United States is imperfect, and that the territory described does not belong to this Nation because of the omission of some of the technical terms used in ordinary conveyances of real estate. (Wilson v. Shaw, 204 U.S. 24.)

That is the phrase—"hypercritical to contend."

That unanimous Supreme Court decision affirming U.S. sovereignty over the Panama Canal Zone still stands as a law of our land, and was reaffirmed by the U.S. Court of Appeals decision in 1971 (United States v. Husband R. Roach, 453 F. 2d 1054, 1057) where the court said:

The Canal Zone is an unincorporated territory of the United States.

Both of these cases clearly reaffirm the fact that the Canal Zone is "territory" of the United States. Consequently, under the terms of article IV, section 3, of the U.S. Constitution, not only two-thirds of the U.S. Senate but a majority of the U.S. House of Representatives must approve the proposed treaties as well.

Additionally, it should be pointed out that our Government actually made payment to individual property owners at the time the original treaty was promulgated. Besides the initial payment of $10 million to the Panamanian Government, the United States paid approximately $4 million for acquisition of property from ownerships that existed in the Canal Zone area. We paid over $300,000 to the French for land rights they already possessed in that region. So I think there is little question that we currently have clear title to this territory. As such, both Houses of Congress must participate in its transfer, and the amendment offered by Senator HATCH of Utah will make this a precondition to enforcement of this treaty.

POPULAR SUPPORT

Mr. President, the communications I have received from constituents in my own State, as well as from other parts of the country, indicate that there is considerable attention and concern about this aspect. It is not simply a dilemma dreamed up by treaty opponents as a means of obstruction.

I often have wondered, since the debate on the first treaty, why those who offer amendments and those who try to perfect the treaties are referred to more often than not as obstructionists, while others who support the treaties and beat down every effort to amend the treaties are sometimes referred to as statesmen.

I suggest that this amendment is not offered for that purpose. It is not simply a dilemma dreamed up by treaty opponents.

Because there is so much attention to the issue, I feel that the historical decision on this point, which will be made by the Senate on Wednesday of this week, may have serious ramifications for the perceived legitimacy of the treaty ratification process. It is considerably significant that 231 Members of the House of Representatives have already petitioned their own leadership to give them a voice in the transfer of our Canal Zone property. That is over one-half of the House membership. It is rare that you get such strong bipartisan consensus on such a controversial issue. Unfortunately, there are not that many Republicans in the House of Representatives.

A PRECEDENT FOR THE FUTURE

Perhaps the thing that concerns me the most, Mr. President, is the fact that the decision which we make on this very important question will stand as a precedent for future treaty consideration by the U.S. Congress. It is precisely because there is no clear precedent at this time that this issue has been so controversial. The Senate will, in effect, be establishing a very significant constitutional standard. It will bear not only on the separation of powers between the executive and legislative branch, but also upon the relationship between the two Houses of Congress with respect to treaty consideration.

Let us not underestimate the historical consequence of our duty in this regard. In my opinion, the detrimental aspects of denying the House of Representatives their rightful participation in the transfer of our property could, in effect, upset a delicate balance of duties which were carefully drafted by the Founding Fathers of this Nation.

I reject the contention by one of my distinguished colleagues who sits on the Senate Foreign Relations Committee, who, during the course of committee consideration on this point, asked rhetorically:

Why should we give them (the House of Representatives) a shot at it?

The comment was meant to suggest that this was simply another effort by treaty opponents to kill the accord. But I feel that comment was insensitive to the legitimate desire by our colleagues in the other body to exercise their proper role in the transfer of American property in Panama.

It is my hope that serious reflection by each Member of the Senate will facilitate adoption of this amendment on Wednesday.

Mr. President, I commend the distinguished Senator from Utah for his tireless efforts. He has spent hour after hour on this floor, on this one issue, not just because he desires to talk about the Panama Canal Treaty or the amendment, but because he recognizes the significance of this amendment.

It seems to me that there is a dilemma. We have almost gone full circle during the debate on the treaty first considered, the Neutrality Treaty, to this treaty, which in effect it is the giveaway. Whether you are for or a gainst the treaty, it is a fact that this gives the Panama Canal to Panama.

It gives more power to Omar Torrijos. Maybe he should have more. Maybe we should ask the American people to prop up that leader of Panama.

I suggest that we probably are dealing with one of the most important amendments to be considered by this body.

The Senator from Kansas indicated at the outset that he has not had the opportunity to pay close attention to the debate for the past 2 days. But as I review my mail on the Panama Canal issue, as I look back to the preconvention campaign in 1976, I recall that this was the big issue in the Republican Party. It became an issue because of the efforts of Governor Reagan. I do not share the view of Governor Reagan. In fact, the sovereignty issue does not bother the Senator from Kansas as much as control and maintenance and who is going to be there to operate the canal, and all the other ramifications about the cost and about the interests of our country.

Is the canal important? Is it important to our military interests? Is it important to our economic interests? Will these interests be jeopardized if we transfer the property to Panama? No one knows for certain.

I never have questioned the motives of those who support the treaties. I think the distinguished majority leader and the distinguished minority leader deserve great credit for those who support the treaties because they were able to get enough votes.

So the first treaty was adopted. Now we have reached the second treaty. Of course, it is obvious that amendments will not be accepted willingly. So the distinguished Senator from Utah is making every effort to educate the American people, to inform those of us in the Senate who have the final responsibility of the serious nature of this amendment.

The issue seems rather clear, just upon a reading of the Constitution, if we look at article III, section 2, as the Senator from Kansas indicated earlier. It says that the President shall have the power, with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senators concur.

Then we look at article IV, section 3, with respect to transfer of property. Based on the Supreme Court decision referred to, we know that it is the property of the United States. That is where we have the dilemma, because that article clearly states "the Congress"—and the Congress is both the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States. Article IV, section 3, states:

The Congress shall have Power to dispcse of and make all needful Rules and Regulations respecting the Territory of other Property belonging to the United States; . . .

So, Mr. President, the Senator from Kansas supports the amendment and commends the distinguished Senator from Utah for his tireless efforts.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I thank the distinguished Senator from Kansas for his usual effective approach to many problems. I have deep appreciation for the astuteness with which he has approached this area and for the kind remarks he has made about the Senator from Utah.

Mr. President, how much time is remaining to the Senator from Utah?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair advises that the Senator from Utah has 30 minutes remaining and the Senator from Idaho has 50 minutes remaining.

Mr. HATCH. I thank the Chair.

Mr. President, the purpose of my remarks yesterday was to reveal the many errors contained in the Foreign Relations Committee Report on the constitutional question of whether the President may dispose of public lands by a self-executing treaty. In my view, every paragraph, and indeed almost every sentence of the report addressing this question is either false, misleading, or irrelevant.

At the appropriate time, after I have had an opportunity to study all of the committee's responses to my analysis of the report, I shall again return to this subject.

Today, however, I wish to discuss, in greater detail, one of the more conspicuous errors of the report by the Foreign Relations Committee and to bring to the attention of the Senate additional facts and precedents which the committee has overlooked. These facts and precedents, as I shall demonstrate today, go to the heart of the committee report and completely undermine the peculiar theory of the treaty power which the committee, the State Department, and the Justice Department are attempting to engraft upon the Constitution.

Throughout the committee report, as I noted yesterday, the constitutional issue has been repeatedly misstated and misrepresented. Again and again the report states that the issue we are debating is whether the treaty power may be exercised in order to transfer property. The statement on page 65 of the report provides a representative sampling of the committee's profound misunderstanding of the constitutional question we are considering, "The constitutional text," says the committee, "gives no reason to assume that the power to dispose of property may be exercised only by statute, and not by treaty."

The question, of course, is not whether property may be disposed of by treaty, but whether it may be disposed of by a self-executing treaty. Why the committee and its supporters on the floor persistently misrepresent the true issue is a matter of no little concern to me. By improperly presenting the constitutional issue, the committee has promoted widespread confusion and misunderstandings that can only serve to conceal a dangerous exercise of unprecedented executive power and embarrass the Senate. What is more, these continued misrepresentations have very artfully set up a strawman to make it appear that my amendment is challenging a well-established practice of transferring public lands by a treaty. But I remind the members of the Foreign Relations Committee that there has never been any serious doubt, at least since 1795, when the Jay Treaty was debated on this floor, that the power to dispose of property may be exercised by treaty. No Member of this body is challenging the right of the President to make a treaty disposing of American territory and property. What we are challenging is the administration's claim that such a disposal can be effected by a self-executing treaty, without the approval of Congress. When the President makes a treaty, all he makes is a contract, an executory contract. He has the right to do that. But only Congress can make that contract the law of the land when the contract calls for the transfer of American territory to a foreign government. He can make the treaty, he can make the contract, but he cannot make the law. Only Congress can convert the treaty into law, and without a law this contract to give away the Panama Canal has no legal effect.

The source of the committee's hopeless confusion, Mr. President, seems to be the committee's profound misunderstanding of the so-called concurrent power theory of the President respecting treaties. Both the State Department and the Foreign Relations Committee have insisted that the President has the authority to bypass the House of Representatives because he has concurrent authority with Congress to dispose of public property. Such a view represents a complete distortion of the concurrent power theory.

To understand the origin and meaning of the concurrent power theory, which rests at the whole foundation of the Foreign Relations Committee report, it is necessary to turn back to 1795, when this theory was first offered by Alexander Hamilton. The first major treaty that this Nation made under the new Constitution was the Jay Treaty of 1795.

The purpose of the treaty was to resolve disputes between the United States and Great Britain arising out of the American Revolution and the refusal of the British to abide by certain provisions of the treaty of 1783, which had been made by the Congress under the Articles of Confederation. In 1794, Chief Justice John Jay concluded a treaty of peace and commerce, which was approved by the Senate the following year after a bitter contest and one of the greatest political debates in American history.

The major objection to the treaty was that it violated the Constitution. The treaty regulated commerce and the Constitution gave that power to Congress, which included the House of Representatives; yet the House had not been consulted. The treaty also involved naturalization, the punishment of piracies, the laying of imposts, and the expenditure of money—and all of these subjects were expressly placed under the control of Congress. Thus the question was raised whether a commercial treaty, or an international compact requiring an appropriation of money, or indeed any treaty whatever dealing with the delegated powers of Congress could be made by the President.

In a series of public letters under the signature of "Camillus," Alexander Hamilton vindicated the treaty and set to rest the question of constitutionality. These letters by Hamilton were his last great exposition of the Constitution, and they represent the most extensive analyses of the treaty power ever written by one of the Framers.

In letter No. 36, Hamilton explained that the Constitution does not specify the kinds of treaties which can be made, and that

> The general proposition must, therefore, be, that whatever is a proper subject of compact between nation and nation, may be embraced by a treaty between the President of the United States, with the advice and consent of the Senate, and the correspondent organ of a foreign state.

At the same time, he insisted, the treaty power is not unlimited:

> It shall not change the Constitution; which results from this fundamental maxim, that a delegated authority cannot alter the constituting act, unless so expressly authorized by the constituting power. An agent cannot new-model his own commission—a treaty, for example, cannot transfer the legislative power to the executive department . . .

Furthermore, he added:

> A treaty which should manifestly betray or sacrifice the private interests of the state, would be null . . . Thus the power of treaty, though extending to the right of making alliances offensive and defensive, might not be exercised in making an alliance, so injurious to the state as to justify the non-observance of the contract.

But, he said, these are the only exceptions to the treaty power. It is therefore erroneous to state—> that a treaty can establish nothing between the United States and a foreign nation, which is the province of the legislative authority to regulate in reference to the United States alone.

The important distinction to keep in mind, Hamilton observed, is the difference between laws and treaties. They operate by different means and on different subjects:

> The power to make laws is "the power of pronouncing authoritatively the will of the nation as to all persons and things over which it has jurisdiction,"; or it may be defined to be "the power of prescribing rules binding upon all persons and things over which the nation has jurisdiction."

In other words, he explained, the power to make laws is primarily an internal matter that—> acts complusively upon all persons, whether foreigners or citizens, and upon all things within the territory of such nation, and also upon its own citizens and their property without its territory in certain cases and under certain limitations.

But the power to make laws—> can have no obligatory action whatsover upon a foreign nation, or upon any person or thing within the jurisdiction of a foreign nation.

On the other hand, the power to make treaties, said Hamilton—> is the power by agreement, convention, or compact to establish rules binding upon two or more nations, their respective citizens and property. The rule established derives its reciprocal obligation from promise, from the faith which the contracting parties pledge to each other—not from the power of either to prescribe a rule for the other.

Thus it may be seen that—the means which the power of legislation employs are laws which it enacts, or rules which it enjoins; the subject upon which it acts is the nation of whom it is, the persons and property within the jurisdiction of the nation. The means which the power of treaty employs are contracts with other nations and the subjects upon which it acts are the nations contracting and those persons or things of each to which the contract relates.

So on the one hand we are talking about legislating and on the other contracting. The difference between the two is further amplified by the fact observed Hamilton, that—though a treaty may effect what a law can, yet a law cannot effect what a treaty does.

The key to an understanding of the difference between laws and treaties, concludes Hamilton, is recognition of the fact that the purpose of treaties is to accomplish that which cannot be done by laws; or as Hamilton puts it—

It is the province of the latter (treaties) to do what the former (laws) cannot do.

Applying these considerations to the Jay Treaty, which included provisions for commercial agreements, Hamilton rejected the view that the United States could not make a treaty with Great Britain on this subject simply because it is provided in the Constitution that Congress "shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations." Congress, he noted, may regulate, by law, our domestic trade and "that which foreigners come to carry on with us."

But here is the crucial consideration: Congress "cannot regulate the trade which we may go to carry on in foreign countries"; Congress "can give to us no rights, no privileges there. This must depend on the will and regulations of those countries; and consequently it is the province of the power of treaty to establish the rules of commercial intercourse between foreign nations and the United States. The legislative may regulate our own trade, but treaty only can regulate the national trade between our own country and another country."

To put it another way, the treaty power extends to "commerce with foreign nations" in those instances where the laws of Congress cannot reach, that is to those aspects of foreign commerce which are subject to the jurisdiction of a foreign government. Congress has the "power to regulate commerce with foreign nations." But it does not have the power to regulate the commerce of a foreign state that lies beyond the jurisdiction of the United States; that commerce can be reached only by the treaty power and the acquiescence of a foreign government. As Hamilton explains:

When it is said that Congress shall have power to regulate commerce with foreign nations, this has reference to the distribution of the general legislative power of regulating trade between the national and the particular governments; and serves merely to distinguish the right of regulating our external trade, as far as can be done by law, which is vested in Congress, from that of regulating the trade of a State within itself, which is left to each state.

In sum—

It is indeed an absurdity to say that the power of regulating trade by law is incompatible with the power of regulating it by treaty; since the former can, by no means, do what the latter can alone accomplish.

One of the principal purposes of the treaty power, then, is to accomplish an objective through contracts with foreign nations that cannot be accomplished through law. In this sense, the treaty power allows the United States, in its sovereign capacity, to attain goals which cannot be reached through the ordinary course of legislation. Simply put, the treaty power extends to those objects which are beyond the jurisdiction of Congress and the Nation.

In this instance, neither the House of Representatives nor the Congress as a whole can properly object to the exercise of the treaty power on constitutional grounds, since the object of the treaty is beyond the scope of Congress delegated powers.

When, however, the obligation assumed under a treaty falls within the purview of Congress powers, and the object of the treaty could also have been achieved through legislation, it is clear that the treaty cannot become the law of the land unless Congress consents. Otherwise the treaty power could be used to override the delegated powers of Congress. This would amount to the transfer of the legislative power to the executive department by treaty which, as Hamilton explains, is forbidden by the Constitution.

Applying Hamilton's reasoning to the territorial or disposal-of-property clause of article IV of the Constitution, it is readily apparent that a treaty disposing of public lands seeks to accomplish an objective which can already be reached by regular statute. It is not the same as a treaty which purports to deal with objects beyond the jurisdiction of the United States, and can be reached only by treaty—American territory is a domestic concern. It, as well as the inhabitants therein, is under the jurisdiction of Congress and the United States. The subject of a treaty disposing of American territory, unlike a treaty concerning external commercial relations with a foreign state, is strictly internal. It is, to repeat, a domestic matter concerning American property and American citizens. The treaty power is not even needed to effect the disposal.

The principle was clearly explained by Edward S. Corwin, the preeminent constitutional authority, in his classic study on The President: Office and Powers. On February 9, 1922, Congress passed a statute creating a commission to carry out agreements with other governments regarding certain foreign debts. The question was raised whether these agreements should not be made by treaty rather than an act of Congress. "The fact is," observed Corwin, "that on occasions like this the treatymaking power is a fifth wheel to the coach. For ever had it been resorted to, the resulting agreements would still have to receive the approval of Congress, to which the Constitution assigns the power to dispose of property of the United States, which is what these debts undoubtedly were" (p. 216). "Similarly, there are even instances where territory has been acquired by Congress after the treaty process broke down. Thus it was by simple congressional resolution that Texas was annexed in 1845 after the Senate defeated a treaty for the same purpose. It was thus that Hawaii was annexed in 1898 after a treaty for the purpose had been blocked by a group of Cleveland Democrats" (Corwin, p. 216).

In letter No. 37, Hamilton discusses the relationship between certain delegated powers of Congress and the treaty power, and argues that "In all these cases the power to make laws and the power to make treaties are concurrent." Here, then, is Hamilton's theory of concurrent powers which the State Department and the Foreign Relations Committee repeatedly cite in support of the view that the President may dispose of public lands by a self-executing treaty. As we shall now observe, however, this represents a gross distortion of Hamilton's views.

One of the delegated powers of Congress which Hamilton examines in detail is the disposal-of-property power under article IV. According to the opponents of the Jay Treaty, he observes—

The Constitution is said to be violated in that part which empowers Congress to dispose of, and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory, or other property of the United States, by those provisions of the treaty which respect the adjustment of boundary in the cases of the rivers St. Croix and Mississippi.

But upon closer examination we find, says Hamilton, that there has been no violation of the Constitution because the property in question is subject to dispute. Only were the property clearly and unquestionably belongs to the United States, he suggests, is the President forbidden to transfer it by treaty alone. "As to the disposal and regulation of the territory and property of the United States," says Hamilton, "this will be naturally understood of dispositions and regulations purely domestic, and where the title is not disputed by a foreign power." But, he continues, "where there are interfering claims of foreign powers * * * treaty must directly or indirectly adjust the dispute."

What Hamilton is suggesting, in other words, is that Congress has full and complete control over territory and property belonging to the United States, and that property of this nature, which is "purely domestic," would not be subject to the treaty power unless, of course, Congress authorized its disposal. In the case of disputed property, on the other hand, only the treaty power can adjust the boundary and establish clear title, because the power of Congress does not extend to territories which do not clearly belong to the United States or are not under the jurisdiction of the United States. In cases of this kind, Congress does not really have any property to dispose.

Now if we apply Hamilton's understanding of the relationship between the disposal of property power and the treaty power to the Panama Canal Treaty, it is obvious that Hamilton would oppose the transfer of this territory by a self-executing treaty. The Canal Zone is an American territory, "purely domestic," that is under the jurisdiction of Congress. There is no disputed title. If Congress has the power to dispose of this territory under its own authority—which it surely has—without the need of a treaty, then surely the President does not have the authority to dispose of it by a self-executing treaty, contrary to the wishes of Congress. The treaty power cannot be used to nullify the powers of Congress or remove its jurisdiction unless Congress indicates that it wishes to surrender or delegate its power to the President.

In Letter No. 38, Hamilton goes one step further by pointing out that even treaties with Indian tribes, which do not involve cessions of American territory, but boundary disputes and the acquisition of land, have proceeded on the basis of congressional approval. "Our treaties with several Indian nations," he observes, "regulate and change the boundaries between them and the United States. And in addition to compensations in gross, they stipulate the payment of certain species and perpetual annuities. Thus a treaty in August 1790, with the Creeks (article 5) promises them the yearly sum of $1,500. And similar features are found in susbequent treaties with the six Nations; the Cherokees, and the North Western Indians. This last has just been ratified by the unanimous voice of the Senate. It stipulates an annuity of $9,500 and relinquishes to the Indians, a large tract of land which they had, by preceding treaties, ceded to the United States."

From this Hamilton concludes that—

> Our former treaties under the present government, as well as one subsequent to that under consideration, contradict the doctrine set up against its constitutionality—in the important particulars of making dispositions concerning the territory and property of the United States, and binding them to raise and pay money. These treaties have not only been made by the President and ratified by the Senate, without any impeachment of their constitutionality, but the House of Representatives has heretofore concurred, and without objection, in carrying them into effect, by the requisite appropriation of money.

So there we have it, Mr. President, from Hamilton himself. The Indian treaties for the acquisition of land are constitutional, in Hamilton's view, because Congress carried them into effect. Since these were purchases of land, an appropriation was necessary to carry them into effect; and it may reasonably be deduced that if they were disposals of land, Congress would have to agree to the disposal to carry them into effect also. For the criterion, once again, is whether Congress has given its authority. To acquire property, Congress gives its authority by appropriating the necessary funds; to dispose of property, Congress gives its authority by authorizing the transfer. And where there is a boundary dispute and the United States does not have clear title, Congress approval is not necessary because disputed lands are not necessarily under the jurisdiction of the United States. But according to Hamilton's reasoning, the approval of Congress would be required even for a treaty resolving a boundary dispute if the treaty called for the purchase of any of the disputed lands.

Mr. President, it should be abundantly clear to anyone who has read the letters of Camillus that Hamilton did not intend by the concurrent power theory to justify the exercise of the treaty power that is presently contemplated under the Panama Canal Treaty. As Hamilton clearly explains in letter No. 37, the power of Congress to dispose of territory and property extends to what he calls "purely domestic" property of the United States, "where the title is not disputed by a foreign power." In other words, the disposal power of Congress would extend to a territory such as the Panama Canal Zone. It is an American territory to which we have clear title.

The power of the President, on the other hand, extends to disputed property because only the treaty power can resolve the dispute and establish clear title.

By concurrent power, Hamilton obviously means, in connection with the disposal of property, that both Congress and the President have the power to dispose of property. But the exercise of this power is determined by the jurisdiction which each branch has over the property in question. Thus the Congress has the sole power to dispose of property that is under the jurisdiction of the United States—that is purely domestic property such as American territory, where our title is clear; and the President's power extends to disputed territory, where our title is not clear and the jurisdiction of the United States is either uncertain or nonexistent.

In other words, the Congress and the President have concurrent power to dispose of property, but only Congress has the power to dispose of property belonging to the United States. Of course the treaty power may also be used to dispose of property belonging to the United States, but only if the Congress authorizes the transfer. In general, the purpose of the treaty power is to accomplish what cannot be accomplished by ordinary legislation, not to substitute the treaty power for the legislative power and render the latter null and void.

Such, then, was Hamilton's understanding of the relationship between the power of Congress to dispose of public lands and the treaty power. It is in no way inconsistent with the position that was finally adopted by the House of Representatives with respect to the Jay Treaty. On April 6, 1796, the House passed what is known as the Blount Resolution.

Mr. President, the claims of the House of Representatives which are recorded in this resolution have never—I repeat, never—been relinquished by the House. What is more, this resolution accurately reflects the meaning and substance of the amendment that I have offered to the Panama Canal Treaty. Here are the words of that resolution—and they bear repeating:

> Resolved, That, it being declared by the second section of the second article of the Constitution, "that the President shall have power, by and with the advice of the Senate, to make Treaties, provided two-thirds of the Senate present concur," the House of Representatives do not claim any agency in making Treaties; but that when a treaty stipulates regulations on any of the subjects submitted by the Constitution to the power of Congress, it must depend for its execution, as to such stipulations, on a law or laws to be passed by Congress. And it is the constitutional right and duty of the House of Representatives, in all such cases, to deliberate on the expediency or inexpediency of carrying such Treaty into effect, and to determine and act thereon, as, in their judgment, may be most conducive to the public good. (Annals of Congress, 4 Cong. 1 Sess., reprinted in Allen Johnson (ed.), Readings in American Constitutional History, 1776–1876," p. 205).

Mr. President, Alexander Hamilton is the author of the concurrent theory that the Foreign Relations Committee and the State Department have invoked to justify the disposal of the Panama Canal by a self-executing treaty. As I have said before, it is the whole foundation of the Foreign Relations Committee report. But in the hands of the Foreign Relations Committee, its true and original meaning has been distorted—gnarled and twisted beyond recognition. Like every other precedent cited by the committee, the preposterous rendition of the concurrent power theory is a fraud. And with the departure of this theory, the whole report of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee collapses.

It is also worthy of mention, Mr. President, that Alexander Hamilton favored not a narrow construction of the treaty power, but the broadest construction possible. His writings, especially his Letters of Camillus, are generally regarded as the touchstone for a broadly based exercise of the executive power. And yet we have seen that not even the arguments of Alexander Hamilton can be stretched to support the expansive views of the treaty power concocted by our imaginative Foreign Relations Committee.

Mr. President, one false assumption will give rise to a hundred errors, layer upon layer. Such is the unfortunate circumstance of the Foreign Relations Committee report. The committee's profound misunderstanding of the concurrent power theory explains in large measure why the committee has been unable to grasp the basic constitutional issue that we are addressing. Perhaps this also explains why the committee has apparently been unable to formulate the question properly for others to examine.

I must confess that I am somewhat amused for example, by the distinguished Senator from Maryland's repeated references to a letter signed by 15 law professors. Apparently the constitutional issue was improperly presented to them, because the statement they signed proves absolutely nothing. It is, in fact, an unsupported statement which simply tells us what we have known all along.

Here is the statement that these law professors signed.

> We have been informed that the constitutional validity of the new Panama Canal treaty has been questioned by several lawyers who have claimed that the United States may transfer its property only by legislation enacted by Congress and may not transfer its property by treaty.

We respectfully submit that such a claim is erroneous.

The Constitution unequivocally permits transfer by treaty of property belonging to the United States. The treaty power, and the power of Congress under Article IV, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution, are concurrent powers and either may be used to transfer property.

The treaty power extends to all proper subjects of negotiation with foreign nations; a transfer of United States property is such a subject, and accordingly may be effected by treaty.

And that, Mr. President, is all the statement says. Why the Senator from Maryland regards this statement as so important is quite puzzling to me. All that these lawyers have said is that the transfer of property is the "proper subject" of a treaty, and that "the Constitution unequivocally permits transfer by treaty of property belonging to the United States."

Now who would not sign this? Of course the transfer of property is a proper subject of a treaty. Of course "The Constitution unequivocally permits transfer by treaty of property belonging to the United States."

Indeed it is also true that the treaty power and the power of Congress under article IV are concurrent powers, as Alexander Hamilton explained.

These lawyers might just as well have been asked to sign their names to a statement declaring that two plus two equals four. What they did not sign—and here, Mr. President, is the real significance of this statement—is a statement declaring that the President has the power to transfer American territory to a foreign government by a self-executing treaty. The words "self-executing" are, in fact, conspicuously absent from the statement.

So it appears, Mr. President, that the misunderstandings of the committee regarding the constitutional issue before us have now spread the confines of the committee to other quarters. Even though some of these lawyers are alleged to have been in the employ of the State Department or are apologists for the most liberal construction of the Constitution imaginable, I would hesitate to suggest that any of these distinguished gentlemen is collaborating with the administration.

Rather, I think that they, like Members of the Senate, are the innocent victims of the Foreign Relations Committee's helpless misunderstanding of the constitutional issues before us. I regret to say there seems to be no end to this mischief, and I sincerely hope that the committee will improve its understanding of our Constitution before long.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PAUL G. HATFIELD). The time of the Senator from Utah has expired. The Senator from Idaho has 16 minutes.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, within the last few minutes, I have heard the Foreign Relations Committee labeled incompetent, charged with foisting misrepresentations on the Senate, accused of falsehoods, and indicted for issuing a gnarled, twisted and distorted report.

Mr. President, I happen to be proud of my membership on the Foreign Relations Committee. I have served on that committee for nearly 19 years. Throughout the history of the Senate, the Foreign Relations Committee has long been regarded as highly competent, skillful, and knowledgeable in the work it performs and the service it renders to the Senate as a whole.

I think it is rather sad that a freshman Senator should attack the committee in so unrestrained a manner.

The Senator from Utah reminds me of a bumblebee, biggest when first born.

He argues that the Foreign Relations Committee report completely ignores the precedents distinguishing self-executing treaties from those that are not self-executing. He says:

The committee's report makes no mention of the rules that have traditionally been followed by Congress, by our courts and by past Presidents' rules that must be consulted in order to determine the character of this treaty. The report simply assumes, without discusssion, without even acknowledging the existence of these precedents, that this is a self-executing treaty.

Mr. President, the reason the committee's report does not discuss the specific issue of whether this treaty is self-executing and the reason why the Attorney General, the State Department legal adviser, and other administration witnesses did not address that issue as such, is that it begs the question to say that the treaty is self-executing.

The very question in dispute is whether a treaty provision disposing of property belonging to the United States can be self-executing. The entire committee report is directed at discussing this question, as is the testimony of each of the administration witnesses who testified on it. The committee and the administration—and the overwhelming majority of legal scholars who have expressed themselves on the issue—all believe that such a treaty can be self-executing.

The Senator from Utah seems to assume, however, that this is simply one additional question to be debated with all the others. He seems to believe that the question is whether the treaty is intended to be self-executing. Of course, it is intended to be self-executing; it is not necessary to apply any court-formulated test to conclude that. The language of the treaty, the testimony of the administration, and the report of the committee all make clear beyond question that the treaty is intended to be self-executing. That is why we are having this debate. The kinds of tests that Senator HATCH cites are applied by the courts only for the purpose of determining whether the agreement was intended to be self-executing. Said Prof. Louis Henkin in his authoritative treaties "Foreign Affairs and the Constitution":

The courts have considered that to be a matter of interpretation of the agreement, but agreements have often been drafted without attention to that question so that it may be difficult to determine what was contemplated.

I suggest to the Senator that anyone following this debate knows precisely what is contemplated in the Panama Canal Treaty.

It is my intention, Mr. President, to directly rebut the extended arguments of the Senator from Utah by referring to three self-executing treaties of the past which conveyed U.S. Government owned property to foreign governments without benefit of any legislation by Congress. Before doing so, I note that the distinguished Senator from New York is on the floor. I have spoken with him in committee conferences during the day and I know he has come to the floor several times expecting to address this issue. I propose to him that we divide the time remaining to our side between us.

Mr. JAVITS. That is fine, Mr. President.

Mr. CHURCH. For that purpose, Mr. President, I ask the Chair how much time remains to the opponents of the pending amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Thirty-six minutes.

Mr. JAVITS. If the Senator will yield me 15 minutes. I shall be grateful.

Mr. CHURCH. I yield the Senator 15 minutes.

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, I have addressed this issue before, and as we approach the close of the debate on this issue, since we vote tomorrow—and the time tomorrow will be very limited—I should like those who do read the RECORD tonight to have some concept of my own position respecting it.

I realize the temptation to reply to individual points of difference and argue the meaning of individual cases on both sides. This is a temptation in an extended debate such as we are having that it is very easy to accept and, indeed, could prove to be very useful.

Mr. President I should like, if I may, to sum up the legal position which I believe sustains the fact that, this treaty having been submitted as a treaty, a two-thirds vote of the Senate makes the law of the land, which is what the Supreme Court has held time and again with respect to treaties and which is what the Constitution calls for. It is fully within the cases and the historical precedents that, in that treaty, property may be transferred fully in accord with the Constitution.

The point which I think is critical to this matter is, one, that the President exercise his option to submit this particular treaty as a treaty. Of course, the President could, if he chose, have entered into an executive agreement relating to the Panama Canal, which would have been then submitted to both Houses. But he did not choose that course; he chose this course. I believe that our history indicates that this is the course which is proper and can be followed.

I heard with great interest the fact that 235 Members of the House had introduced a resolution alleging that the House also desired jurisdiction of this particular matter. That is House Concurrent Resolution 348, the principal sponsor of which is Mr. HANSEN, with, allegedly, 235 cosponsors. I have no doubt; I use the word "allegedly" only because they are not all printed. I am sure that is so.

Mr. President, I suppose we could get a pretty big majority of the Senate to assert its claim to a revenue measure or a tax measure, which must originate in the other body. We would love to do that on many occasions, and I am sure many Senators could concur. But what does that prove? It simply proves that they do not like the way the Constitution is written; they would like it written some other way. But it is a matter about which we can do absolutely nothing.

It is in accord with legislative desire to want, as it were, to have a part in this particular activity. At a given level, the House will. Their implementing legislation is essential; and we shall have an opportunity, too, to implement the terms of this treaty. But it is not essential under the Constitution.

That is certainly no reason why the Senate has to surrender its jurisdiction, the fact that the House wants it. I have stood in this Chamber on many closing days, Mr. President, in many Congresses in my career here, and have found that the House has gone home, leaving us with some essential appropriations bill which we did not like and which, in our judgment, was odorous to high heaven. But there was nothing we could do about it but take it. No matter how many petitions or how many resolutions we would have filed, the House was not coming back.

So, Mr. President, it is the case with this matter. It has been submitted as a treaty. Therefore, the Constitution says we must have the responsibility. While we respect our House colleagues, that is certainly no argument that the Constitution can or needs to be undone.

Second, Mr. President, it is very clear to me that the tenor of the cases—and the cases are not many that are leading cases on this subject, going to the leading ones, in my judgment—Jones against Meehan, which has been cited time and time again, decided in 1899; Holden against Joy, decided in 1872; and Jeofroy against Riggs, decided in 1890—they clearly decide the fact that when a transfer of property is an incident to a treaty and that property certainly, unequivocally, is outside the confines of the United States, and the issue is between the United States and a foreign country—which is true of the issue here—that can be decided, determined, and made operative by treaty.

The idea which has been put forward here is that it is self-operating, meaning it is something different from another law, some extension, some outreach of authority. Well, Mr. President, this is as much law as any other law that Congress passes. If it were not, it would not be binding, and we could not do anything about the Panama Canal, or taxation treaties, or treaties of commerce and friendship, or agreements with respect to any other matter which is susceptible of being dealt with by treaty between two countries.

So, Mr. President, though there has been a lot of smoke, there is very little, if any, fire, and what little has been flatly determined over the generations by the practice which we have pursued and by the decisions of the Supreme Court.

I believe that transfers of property are not even unusual by force of treaty in the matter of the Panama Canal at all.

In 1955, though some of the transfer of property was passed on by the House, some of the transfer of the property was also made in the treaty itself, and there was no challenge to it. It was, as a matter of fact, law, as that part which went to the House and was enacted as a law.

Of course, we have many other instances. I do not want to steal any of Senator CHURCH's thunder, but the issues are the same in respect of Ryukyu and Okinawa where we gave up a very valuable piece of property, and the Swan Islands, which have been argued here, with a Central American nation. Similarly, in the treaty with Nicaragua, also affecting property outside the United States.

This leads us to reason, Mr. President, then what is the treaty power about if it stops at an act which is an act between the United States and other foreign countries, to wit, a transfer of any property which we may have?

Is it contended for one moment that to acquire or to release or to sell a piece of property which belongs to the United States in a foreign country that we can only do that by law and not by treaty with that foreign country?

Of course, it makes the whole treaty power absolutely barren of real effect.

So, Mr. President, in the final analysis, we must realize one other thing. Our colleagues who are against this treaty and feel that it is a very serious detriment to the United States to enter into this treaty, naturally, will try to defeat it by every means they possibly can, including, if they possibly can do it, making us believe we do not have the power to ratify this treaty and that it must go to the other body.

That is as good a way as defeating it as any other. Indeed, I must say I have a little doubt about this, I doubt very much that the 235 Congressmen who put their names to the resolution they wanted would vote against it if they could because they, too, would then be put to, "What is the best interest of the United States?"

That question has been argued completely and thoroughly and there is no need of my adding to that argument in my own arguments or in the arguments from the cases.

The fact is, Mr. President, that this case has been argued and reargued and reargued in the hope that somehow or other the American people would be induced to rise in their anger in solemn judgment and say to the Senate, "We don't want this treaty."

Indeed, there have been considerable exaggerations, stretching of what the treaty really says and what it really does.

This has gone on, Mr. President, for some 26 or 28 days of debate, for a couple of months of time. But, Mr. President, there has been no such revolution. If anything, the country has gotten more and more accustomed to the fact that this treaty is an absolute necessity if we are going to have tranquility in the Western Hemisphere and that it should be approved.

Mr. President, upon that, I rest my case, the point of Senate debate on the law and the facts, and the policy is to persuade and convince.

I respectfully submit that the persuading and the convincing has been done, not by the opponents, but by the proponents, and that the revolution which they envisaged on the part of the American people has not occurred at all.

On the contrary, this debate has gotten quieter and quieter, as witness the empty galleries and the empty press gallery. The fact that we transmit it over the radio may be a little more of a bore than it is an amusement to most of the American people who are listening to the radio because it has been protracted, probably beyond the point of real instruction.

But, be that as it may, I am a proponent, not an opponent, and the opponents of this treaty not only have every right, but is their duty, I have said that before, to debate it to the full extent that they feel that it ought to be debated.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. Not yet.

But, Mr. President, I believe that the fundamental point has been made now on the law, on the facts, and in the eyes of the public. I hope very much, therefore, that this question may at long last be settled as soon as we possibly can settle it, hopefully, as we expect, this month, and that we may go on to other critical business as far as the country is concerned.

But I deeply believe and I submit that the question of law which is here posed by this amendment is not really a question of law any more and that it has been profoundly settled by decision and by historical precedent, and at least that part of it is clear, that a piece of property can be transferred by a treaty, ratified according to the Constitution, by the Senate of the United States, and that the transfer is legal, valid, and binding on the United States.

Indeed, I offer the prediction, Mr. President, that if this treaty is ratified, there will be no effective contest of the fact that the property transferred under it is legally and fully transferred and that its ownership has truly changed.

Mr. ALLEN. Will the Senator yield?

Mr. JAVITS. If I have any more time, I will.

Mr. CHURCH. I think we are on limited time. I have reserved just enough time to make the concluding argument.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New York has 2 minutes.

Mr. JAVITS. I yield that, if that is all right.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the distinguished Senator from New York for yielding.

The Senator has talked about the 1955 treaty. Of course, article V in the 1955 treaty makes reference to three separate dispositions of property and in each case it has the phrase, "subject to enactment of legislation by the Congress."

Then the Senator spoke of articles VI and VII which actually have to do with boundary line disputes rather than the actual conveyance of property. But even in that instance, I call the distinguished Senator's attention to the fact that Secretary Holland back in 1955, when the 1955 treaty was before the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, and Senator Morse was questioning him. He asked about the legislation that was to be submitted.

I have here before me what appears in the report of hearings before the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate on the Panama Canal Treaty, pages 60 and 61, where Mr. Holland, representing the State Department, submitted a memorandum. I refer to it here, and his memorandum says:

Articles V, VI, and VII of the treaty and item 2 of the memorandum transfer certain lands and improvements to Panama. Authorizing legislation is required. Necessary replacement would require appropriations.

So, apparently, the Secretary of Inter-American Affairs, appearing before the Foreign Relations Committee in support of the 1955 treaty, stated that authorizing legislation by the Congress would be required.

Does the Senator have familiarity with that hearing?

Mr. JAVITS. Mr. President, not to intrude, I do not think anything the Senator has said challenges the proposition that there was a self-executing transfer of property in that treaty. In aid of that, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a memorandum specifying the terms of the paragraphs of the treaty which are referred to.

Mr. ALLEN. Authorizing legislation was enacted, was it not?

Mr. JAVITS. I said that.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I call for the regular order. I am on limited time.

There being no objection, the material was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

TREATY BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES AND PANAMA (MUTUAL UNDERSTANDING AND COOPERATION), JANUARY 25, 1955, 6 U.S.T. 2283

The treaty of 1955 provided for transfers of property belonging to the United States in Articles V, VI and VII. Article V was not drafted in self-executing terms but was predicated on enactment of legislation by the Congress. It concerned real property located in the territory under the jurisdiction of Panama and depended on a determination that such property was no longer needed. The details were specified in a Memorandum of Understandings (attached to the treaty), item no. 2.

The transfers in Articles VI and VII were couched in self-executing terms and involved a change in the boundary of the Canal Zone. The property transferred by Article VI consisted of (a) a strip of water around the Colon shores, (b) a small unused site known as Battery Morgan and (c) a small portion of the Colon end of the Colon Corridor. The property transferred by Article VII consisted of a landing pier and the land and water area under the pier. All properties transferred were described in the Message of the President, transmitting the treaty for advice and consent to the Senate (84th Cong., 1st Sess., Sen., Executive F). The self-executing nature of the transfers in Articles VI and VII were expressly recognized both in the Memorandum of Understandings attached to the treaty, item No. 2 f, and in the Congressional statute implementing the article providing the transfers (71 U.S. Stat. 509, Sec. 102(b)).

MEMORANDUM OF UNDERSTANDING REACHED

In connection with the 1953–1954 negotiations between representatives of the United States of America and the Republic of Panama, which have resulted in the signature of a Treaty between the two countries, the following understandings have been reached:

On the part of the United States of America:

1. Legislation will be sought which will authorize each agency of the United States Government in the Canal Zone to conform its existing wage practices in the Zone to the following principles:

(a) The basic wage for any given grade level will be the same for any employee eligible for appointment to the position without regard to whether he is a citizen of the United States or of the Republic of Panama.

(b) In the case of an employee who is a citizen of the United States, there may be added to the base pay an increment representing an overseas differential plus an allowance for those elements, such as taxes, which operate to reduce the disposable income of such an employee as compared with an employee who is a resident of the area.

(c) The employee who is a citizen of the United States will also be eligible for greater annual leave benefits and travel allowances because of the necessity for periodic vacations in the United States for recuperation purposes and to maintain contact with the employee's home environment.

Legislation will be sought to make the Civil Service Retirement Act uniformly applicable to citizens of the United States and of the Republic of Panama employed by the Government of the United States in the Canal Zone.

The United States will afford equality of opportunity to citizens of Panama for employment in all United States Government positions in the Canal Zone for which they are qualified and in which the employment of United States citizens is not required, in the judgment of the United States, for security reasons.

The agencies of the United States Government will evaluate, classify and title all positions in the Canal Zone without regard to the nationality of the incumbent or proposed incumbent.

Citizens of Panama will be afforded opportunity to participate in such training programs as may be conducted for employees by United States agencies in the Canal Zone.

2. With reference to that part of Article V of the Treaty signed today which deals with the conveyance to the Republic of Panama free of cost of all the right, title and interest held by the United States of America or its agencies in and to certain lands and improvements situated in territory under the jurisdiction of the Republic of Panama, steps will be taken as provided in this Item.

(a) Legislation will be sought to authorize and direct the transfer to the Republic of Panama of all the right, title and interest held by the United States or its agencies in or to the following real property:

1. The J. N. Vialette and Huerta de San Doval tracts in the city of Panama and the Aspinyall tract on the Island of Taboga.

2. Las Isletas and Santa Catalina Military Reservations on the Island of Taboga. This transfer will include the cable rights-of-way which have a width of 20 feet (6.10 meters) and extend between the Ancon Cove Military Reservation and the Santa Catalina Military Reservation, and between the El Vigia Military Reservation and the Las Isletas Military Reservation.

3. The lot in Colón now reserved for consulate purposes.

4. Certain lands on the westerly shores of the city of Colón described roughly as extending from the southerly boundary of the de Lessepa area (4th Street extended) to the Colón-Canal Zone boundary and bounded on the east by the east wall of the old freight house and, below that structure, by a line 25 feet (7.622 meters) west of the center line of of the most westerly railroad track. This transfer will include the certain improvements consisting of the old freight house and Colón Pier Number 3.

(b) Legislation will be sought to authorize and direct the Panama Canal Company to remove its railway terminal operations from the city of Panama and to transfer to the Republic of Panama free of cost all of the right, title and interest of the Panama Canal Company in and to the lands known as the Panama Railroad Yard, including the improvements thereon and specifically including the railway passenger station. This action will also relieve the Government of the Republic of Panama of its obligation under Point 10 of the General Relations Agreement between the United States of America and the Republic of Panama signed May 18, 1942 to make available without cost to the Government of the United States of America a suitable new site for such terminal facilities.

(c) With respect to those areas in the city of Colón known as de Lessepa, Colón Beach and New Cristobal (with the exception of two lots in the de Lessepa area which the United States intends to use for consulate purposes), legislation will be sought to authorize and direct the gradual withdrawal from these areas and the conveyance or transfer to the Republic of Panama free of cost of all the right, title and interest of the United States and of its agency, the Panama Canal Company, in and to the lands and improvements thereon. Under this process of gradual withdrawal the United States Government, and/or its agencies, will not be obligated to install any new structure in such areas and, as severable parts of the areas cease to be needed, the lands and improvements would be conveyed or transferred. The severability of parts of the areas depends upon a number of practical considerations including those having to do with the present obligations of the United States, with respect to the subject areas, concerning water and sewerage facilities, street cleaning and paving, water supply, et cetera, as stipulated in the Instrument of Transfer of Water and Sewerage Systems, executed between the Governor of the Panama Canal and the Foreign Minister of Panama on December 28, 1945.

(d) With respect to the railroad passenger station and site in the city of Colón, legislation will be sought to authorize and direct the withdrawal from such site and structure at such time as the withdrawal from the areas known as de Lesseps, Colón Beach and New Cristobal, contemplated by the next preceding subparagraph, shall have been fully completed, and the conveyance to the Republic of Panama free of cost of all the right, title and interest of the United States and of its agency, the Panama Canal Company, in and to such site and structure. However, the railroad tracks and trackage area in Colón, being required for switching purposes serving the Cristobal piers, will be retained for such purposes.

(e) All transfers or conveyance of lands and improvements contemplated by this Item, subject to legislative authorization and direction, will necessarily be made subject to any leases which may be outstanding in the respective areas, and will also contain provisions fully protecting the Government of the United States of America against any claims by lessees for damages or losses which may arise as a result of such transfers or conveyances.

(f) The transfers or conveyances contemplated by this Item, subject to legislative authorization, are in addition to the conveyance of Paitilla Point as specifically covered by Article V of the Treaty signed today, and to the transfer of real property effected by Article VI of said Treaty.

3. Articles, materials, and supplies that are mined, produced or manufactured in the Republic of Panama, when purchased for use in the Canal Zone, will be exempted from the provisions of the Buy American Act.

4. Referring to the exchange of notes dated March 2, 1936, accessory to the General Treaty between the United States of America and the Republic of Panama signed on that date, relative to the sale to ships of goods imported into the Canal Zone by the Government of the United States of America, the United States of America agrees, effective December 31, 1956, and in benefit of Panamanian commerce, to withdraw wholly from, and thereafter to refrain from, any such sales to ships, provided that nothing in this Item shall apply:

(a) to sales to ships operated by or for the account of the Government of the United States of America,

(b) to the sale of fuel or lubricants, or

(c) to any sale or furnishing of ships stores which is incidental to the performance of ship repair operations by any agency of the Government of the United States of America.

5. Legislative authorization and the necessary appropriations will be sought for the construction of a bridge at Balboa referred to in Point 4 of the General Relations Agreement of 1942.

6. The United States of America agrees, effective December 31, 1956, to withdraw from persons employed by agencies of the Government of the United States of America in the Canal Zone who are not citizens of the United States of America and who do not actually reside in said Zone the privilege of availing themselves of services which are offered within said Zone except those which are essential to health or necessary to permit them to perform their duties.

7. It is and will continue to be the policy of the Panama Canal agencies and of the Armed Forces in the Canal Zone in making purchases of supplies, materials and equipment, so far as permitted under United States legislation, to afford to the economy of the Republic of Panama full opportunity to compete for such business.

8. In general connection with the matter of the importation of items of merchandise for resale in the sales stores in the Canal Zone, it will be the practice of the agencies concerned to acquire such items either from United States sources or Panamanian sources unless, in certain instances, it is not feasible to do so.

9. With respect to the manufacture and processing of goods for sale to or consumption by individuals, now called on by the Panama Canal Company, it will be the policy of the United States of America to terminate such activities whenever and for so long as such goods, or particular classes thereof, are determined by the United States of America to be available in the Republic of Panama on a continuing basis, in satisfactory qualities and quantities, and at reasonable prices. The United States of America will give prompt consideration to a request in writing on the part of the Government of Panama concerning the termination of the manufacture or processing of any goods covered in this Item as to which the Government of Panama may consider the criteria specified in this Item to have been met.

10. Prompt consideration will be given to withdrawing from the handling of commercial cargo for transshipment on Canal Zone piers so soon as Panamanian port facilities are in satisfactory operation in Colón.

11. The United States agrees that the term "auxiliary works" as used in the Treaty includes the Armed Forces of the United States of America.

On the part of the Republic of Panama:

1. The Republic of Panama will lease to the United States of America, free of all cost save for the recited consideration of one Balboa, for a period of 99 years, two parcels of land contiguous to the present United States Embassy residence site, as designated on the sketch (No. SGN–9–54, dated November 19, 1954) and accompanying descriptions prepared by the Comisión Catastral of the Republic of Panama, attached hereto.

2. The Republic of Panama assures the United States of America that the property, shown and described on the attached map (No. SGN–6–54, dated October 1954) and accompanying description prepared by the Comisión Catastral of the Republic of Panama, in front of the United States Embassy office building site and between the Bay of Panama and Avenida Balboa as it may be extended between 37th and 39th Streets, will be preserved permanently as a park and not developed for commercial or residential purposes.

3. So long as the United States of America maintains in effect those provisions of Executive Order No. 6997 of March 25, 1935 governing the importation of alcoholic beverages into the Canal Zone, the Republic of Panama will grant a reduction of 75 percent in the import duty on alcoholic beverages which are sold in Panama for importation into the Canal Zone pursuant to such Executive Order.

4. In connection with the authorization granted to the United States of America in Article VIII of the Treaty, the United States shall have free access to the beach areas contiguous to the maneuver area described in said Article VIII for purposes connected with training and maneuvers, subject to the public use of said beach as provided under the Constitution of Panama.

The provisions of this Memorandum of Understandings Reached shall enter into force upon the exchange of instruments of ratification of the Treaty signed this day by the United States of America and the Republic of Panama.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, as the distinguished Senator from New York pointed out, our prior treaty practice contradicts the contention of the sponsor of the pending amendment. A number of self-executing treaties may be considered as precedents for disposition of property without authorization by act of Congress. I will discuss three of them: First, our 1971 treaty with Honduras, relinquishing all U.S. claims to the Swan Islands and also transferring property and equipment on the islands to Honduras; second, the 1971 treaty between the United States and Japan returning Okinawa and other islands to Japan, and; third, our 1970 treaty with Nicaragua by which the United States returned to that country certain proprietary rights we had held since 1914.

The Senator from Utah (Mr. HATCH) alleged yesterday that "the President has never made a self-executing treaty ceding American territory and property to a foreign state."

Yet, as he himself later conceded, the President has indeed transferred property to a foreign government by self-executing treaty, "Congress silence," said the Senator, "may have indicated tacit consent to the transfers of disputed parcels of insignificant property" under the Honduras Treaty of 1971.

Let me review the situation that existed between the United States and Honduras which led to the dispute over the Swan Islands and exactly what the Honduras Treaty of 1971 accomplished.

In the first half of the 19th century, American explorers claimed they had discovered the Swan Islands, located just off the coast of Honduras. The islands were covered with guano, a valuable fertilizer. The United States claimed sovereignty over the islands by the Guano Act of 1846. Honduras objected, claiming sovereignty as well. The dispute lasted for more than a century ending with the Honduras Treaty of 1971, whereby the Swan Islands were ceded to Honduras. Let me review exactly what the treaty with Honduras on the Swan Islands, entered into on November 22, 1971, provides.

Article I of the treaty provides:

The Government of the United States recognizes the sovereignty of Honduras over the Swan Islands.

Article IV of the treaty provides:

The Government of the United States of America transfers to the Government of Honduras as of the date this Treaty enters into force all land, buildings, equipment and other real and personal property in the Swan Islands to which it holds title, except as agreed pursuant to Article II of this Treaty.

Article II related to certain meteorological and communication facilities used for a cooperative program established on the same date.

Although the relinquishment of the claim to sovereignty over the islands might be construed as stemming from the Guano Island Act of 1856 (II US Stat. c. 164, Sec. 4), the transfer of U.S. Government-owned property later located on the island cannot rest on that statute.

Now, Senator HATCH says that the treaty involved "two minute islands of no significance to the United States." However, if article 4, section 3, clause 2 of the Constitution actually acts as a limitation of the power of the President and the Senate to make treaties, as alleged by the Senator, the size of the property transferred or its importance is of no relevance whatever. If the Constitution did restrict the treaty power, as the Senator maintains, the restriction would apply to all property whether it be the Canal Zone or 1 square foot of desert salt flat.

The Senator from Utah argues that the Swan Island Treaty can be distinguished because it involved disputed territory. The Senator also dismisses previous boundary settlement treaties for the same reason. If the disputed nature of a claim to territory is all that it takes to remove the prohibition on transfer of property by treaty, which the Senator says the Constitution imposes, then how can he exempt the Canal Zone? If anything, the Canal Zone's status is in dispute; not only with reference to sovereignty, but also as to valid title to much of the land the United States claims. Moreover, the Senator's allegation that disputed territory is not covered also ignores basic facts taught in first year law school courses on property. Leaseholds, options, residual interests, and other lesser interests in property, including disputed claims, are still property interests and must be treated as such. If the Constitution required an act of Congress to convey property rights claimed by the United States, as alleged by the Senator, it would necessarily apply to disputed claims of title.

Finally, the Senator from Utah states "Congress silence, in the Swan Island case, may have indicated tacit consent to the transfers of disputed parcels of insignificant property." I have already dealt with the arguments on the disputed or insignificant nature of the property, but the most glaring error of the Senator's argument is the implication that Congress, through silence, can legitimate what the Senator implies would otherwise be an unconstitutional act. Should this be true, there would be nothing to prevent the President from unilaterally appropriating funds, declaring war, or imposing taxes, as long as Congress did not object. Such a convoluted argument is not only wrong, it is a subversion of our constitutional system.

Let me describe another treaty that contradicts the assertions of the Senator from Utah. On June 17, 1971, the United States and Japan agreed to the Treaty on the Reversion of the Ryukyu and Daito Islands.

The major island of the Ryukyu group is Okinawa, the island we conquered during World War II in one of the bloodiest and costliest battles in the Pacific war. On Easter Sunday, April 1, 1945, two corps of army and marines, commanded by Lt. Gen. Simon Buckner, invaded Okinawa. The Japanese fought desperately and organized resistance did not end until more than 2 months later, on June 21, 1945. During that battle, Lt. Gen. Buckner was killed, our forces suffered 49,000 casualties, while Japanese kamikazes sunk 36 of our ships and damaged 332 others. It proved to be the last major island battle of the war.

Under article III of the Treaty of Peace with Japan, the United States obtained sole and full power of administration, legislation, and jurisdiction over the territory of the islands, including their territorial waters. Japan's "residual sovereignty" was recognized by the United States just as Panama's "titular sovereignty" was recognized over the Canal Zone. Again, as in the case of Panama, the rights of the United States to Okinawa were granted for an indefinite period.

Now, let me describe the 1971 treaty by which the United States transferred its rights in Okinawa and other islands back to Japan.

Article I of the treaty provides:

1. With respect to the Ryukyu Islands and the Daito Islands, as defined in paragraph 2 below, the United States of America relinquishes in favor of Japan all rights and interests under Article 3 of the Treaty of Peace with Japan, signed at the City of San Francisco on September 8, 1951, effective as of the date of the entry into force of this Agreement. . . .

Article VI of the treaty provides:

1. The properties of the Ryukyu Electric Power Corporation, the Ryukyu Domestic Water Corporation and the Ryukyu Development Loan Corporation shall be transferred to the Government of Japan on the date of the entry into force of this Agreement and the rights and obligations of said Corporations shall be assumed by the Government of Japan on that date in conformity with the laws and regulations of Japan.

2. All other properties of the Government of the United States of America, existing in the Ryukyu Islands and the Daito Islands as of the date of entry into force of this Agreement and located outside of the facilities and areas provided on that date in accordance with Article III of this Agreement shall be transferred to the Government of Japan, except for those that are located on the lands returned to the landowners concerned before the date of the entry into force of this Agreement. . . .

3. Such lands in the Ryukyu Islands and the Daito Islands reclaimed by the Government of the United States of America and such other reclaimed lands acquired by it in these islands as are held by the Government of the United States as of the date of entry into force of this Agreement become the property of the Government of Japan on that date.

This treaty's article VI was a self-executing transfer. This is evident from the President's message of transmittal to the Senate and the report of the Foreign Relations Committee. Both statements say "article VI transfers to the Government of Japan certain properties of the United States" (92d Cong. 1st Sess., Ex. J., p. IX, 92d Cong. 1st Sess., Ex. Report 92–10, p. 3). The corporations mentioned in article VI were owned by an agency of the U.S. Government, the United States Civil Administration.

We had paid for the islands, particularly Okinawa, with the blood of Americans, they were of enormous strategic value, and American property, valued in the hundreds of millions of dollars was involved. Yet the treaty effectuated the transfer; no act of Congress was necessary.

Also of relevance to this debate is the treaty between the United States and Nicaragua For Termination of Rights and Options under the Bryan-Chamorro Treaty, entered into on July 14, 1970.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CHURCH. I will yield when I am through with my argument if I have the time.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Senator.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, let me first describe the Bryan-Chamorro Treaty of August 5, 1914. We consummated this treaty with Nicaragua to insure we would be able to build a canal through that country if we thought it best for the United States. As Senators know, we never did build that canal, and studies consistently have shown that the most economic route is still through Panama.

Nonetheless, the Bryan-Chamorro Treaty granted to the United States:

First. "* * * in perpetuity the exclusive proprietary rights necessary and convenient for the construction, operation, and maintenance of an inter-oceanic waterway * * * over Nicaraguan territory, the details of the terms * * * to be agreed upon by the two governments whenever the Government of the United States shall notify * * * its * * * intention to construct such canal";

Second. A leasehold for a term of 99 years, with the option of renewal by the United States for another 99 years, of Great Corn Island and Little Corn Island; and Third. The right to establish a naval base on the Gulf of Fonesca, likewise for a period of 99 years subject to a renewal by the United States for a further 99-year period. The islands and the base were to be subject to the laws and sovereign authority of the United States during the terms of such lease and grant.

The consideration was a payment of $3,000,000 to Nicaragua. Congress appropriated the $3,000,000 in the Deficiency Appropriation Act of September 8, 1916, passed after the entry into force of the treaty on June 22, 1916.

The United States never exercised any of the rights or options granted by the 1914 convention and never entered under the leases, except for the construction of a lighthouse. Nevertheless, these rights were territorial and property rights belonging to the United States, valued at $3,000,000 at the time of their acquisition and were relinquished by treaty, in 1970, without benefit of statute.

I think these examples demolish the argument that transferring U.S. property to the Government of Panama by self-executing treaty is some new departure, not founded upon past precedent. We have done it before, it is a constitutional exercise of the treaty-making power, and we can do it again as provided by the terms of the Panama Canal Treaty.

In doing so, Mr. President, we simply reconfirm the authority vested in the Senate by the Constitution of the United States, and we do so in line with past practices.

I am happy to yield to the Senator for a question.

But I shall first inquire: How much time remains for that purpose?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has 4½ minutes remaining.

Mr. CHURCH. I yield to the Senator for a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Alabama.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, could we ask unanimous consent that an additional 10 minutes to be equally divided between the sides be granted? I ask unanimous consent to that effect.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the Senator aware that there is an order to recognize Senator BARTLETT at 6 p.m.?

Mr. ALLEN. Notwithstanding that, I take it on myself to say that the Senator from Oklahoma will not object.

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, I wonder if the Senator would not try to cover this in the time remaining so Senator BARTLETT may be accommodated. He is expecting to take the floor at 6 p.m.

Mr. ALLEN. Very well.

I am interested very much in the speech the distinguished Senator has been reading, and I have been interested in his analysis of the Ryukyu treaty and his feeling that that constitutes precedent for the transfer of property by treaty.

Of course, the Senator knows that as to the conquest of Okinawa I had some little familiarity with that because I happened to be there some 3 days before the invasion actually started and throughout the invasion. But the United States acquired no title by conquest under international law to the Ryukyus, including Okinawa.

So what the United States conveyed was not the real estate, but it was instead our right of administrative control over the island and, of course, not having the title to the real estate by conquest the structures that were placed on that real estate went with the land.

So I would hate for the Senator to feel that this is a proper precedent to indicate that the Senate only through the treatymaking power has the right to transfer property belonging to the United States.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. ALLEN. I make that statement to the distinguished Senator. And he pointed out what we had were the rights of administration over this.

Also I call attention to the Senator, and he is very familiar with the Foreign Aid Act, there is a provision there for the President to dispose of surplus foreign property that we own and in all likelihood if any transfer of foreign property were made it was made under the provisions of this act. I believe the Foreign Relations Committee report states that it may well have been under that act.

Does the Senator care to comment on that?

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, obviously there are various ways by which property belonging to the United States can be disposed. Congress has the authority to dispose of such property by statute or it may confer that authority on the President as is the case under the Foreign Aid Act.

But a third way that property interests may be transferred is by treaty, when the terms of the treaty are self-executing. This was the method used in the three treaties to which I referred. And it seems to me that the observations of the distinguished Senator from Alabama do nothing to deny the validity of these precedents.

Of course, we had conquered the Ryukyu Islands, but the jurisdiction that we obtained in the Treaty of Peace with Japan, entered into in San Francisco, extended far beyond the rights of conquest. Under the terms of that treaty cessions were made to the United States. Later when we decided it was in the American interest to restore the Ryukyu Islands to Japan, that too was accomplished by a self-executing treaty, without benefit of statute.

Mr. ALLEN. I thank the Senator for yielding.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Oklahoma is recognized for 8 minutes.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, I yield 30 seconds to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, I sat here for 2 days to hear the arguments on this matter, and it seems to me that to base the arguments on the dictum in Holden against Joy, the Japan treaties and the Honduran and Nicaraguan treaties hardly justify the transfer of the Panama Canal and hardly substantiate the position of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee.

I basically feel that, as I understand it, with all kinds of constitutional lawyers investigating what we raised yesterday, they hardly have come up with any precedents which really sustain this, I think, violent overthrow of constitutional principles.

I thank the distinguished Senator.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, I yield 30 seconds to the other side.

Mr. SARBANES. Mr. President, I appreciate the Senator's courtesy in offering to make 30 seconds available, but I do not think it is really necessary. The Senator from Utah has made his extended statement. We have analyzed it very carefully, and we think we have responded with good authorities.

The Attorney General was accused earlier of making a statement without even citing any authority. That was clearly not the case, and just because people differ with the Senator from Utah does not, I submit, mean that their position is without merit. I thank the Senator for his courtesy.

Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that a member of my staff, Mr. Sam Currin, be accorded the privilege of the floor during discussion and any votes thereon in connection with the pending treaty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. THURMOND. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that Ken Fish of the Senate Armed Services Committee be accorded that privilege also.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

● Mr. HEINZ. Mr. President, on March 14, in a statement on the Senate floor, I indicated that the Panama Canal Treaties were unacceptable as submitted to the Senate. I also stated that if, and only if, the treaties were amended and three major changes made—changes I judged essential to strengthen the treaties and fully protect our taxpayers and our security interests—would I then support the treaties.

My position today is exactly the same.

In addition to the Baker-Byrd amendments, the two changes I suggested to the Neutrality Treaty were adopted by the Senate when it accepted the reservation by the gentleman from Georgia (Mr. NUNN) and my own reservation. With these amendments and changes, I voted for the Neutrality Treaty on March 16.

The third and remaining change, the one that needs to be made to the second treaty, the Panama Canal Treaty, is one I will continue to insist on. That change is the same one I cited in my March 14 speech. The Panama Canal Treaty must be amended to make certain that any unpaid balance of the so-called $10 million annual contingency payment to Panama, which is supposed to be paid only from surpluses, is not a residual liability to be borne by U.S. taxpayers. The treaty must leave no doubt that if there are any uncollected contingency payments, the balance does not accumulate beyond 1999 and does not come due at that or any other time. Without incorporating this change into the treaty resolution, I will not support the treaty. But, as I have previously stated, I will support the treaty if such a clear and unequivocal provision is adopted, and I am optimistic that such a provision will be included in the treaty resolution.●

A PANAMANIAN POINT OF VIEW

● Mr. CULVER. Mr. President, the March 19 edition of the Cedar Rapids Gazette contained an excellent interview about the Panama Canal treaties with Mr. Wilfredo Uriah Robinson-Hinds of Colon, Panama, who is currently a graduate student at the University of Iowa.

Mr. Robinson-Hinds makes a number of valuable observations in his interview, and his reasonable views offer hope for a cooperative and successful relationship between Panama and the United States under the new treaties.

Mr. President, I ask that the Cedar Rapids Gazette article be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

PANAMA CANAL FOES UNINFORMED

(By Art Hough)

(EDITOR'S NOTE: Wilfredo Uriah Robinson-Hinds of Colon, Panama, is a graduate student at the University of Iowa. He came to the University of Iowa in August 1977 to work on his master of arts degree in mechanical engineering. He is a graduate of the University of Panama and is on a fellowship sponsored by the Organization of American States, in cooperation with the University of Iowa. He is scheduled to receive his advanced degree in December, after which he will return to Panama. His goal is to become a university professor, hopefully in machine design. This interview is an attempt to get the Panamanian point of view concerning the controversial treaties between the United States and the Republic of Panama.)

IOWA CITY.—President Carter and President Omar Torrijos Herrera of Panama signed two controversial treaties last fall. The first would gradually cede control of the Panama Canal to Panama by the year 2000. The second would guarantee neutrality and permanent protection of the canal by the United States.

Within a few weeks, more than 700,000 Panamanians voted in a plebiscite to ratify the new canal treaties. The final count was a 2–1 mandate of 506,805 to 246,177 in favor of the treaties.

In the U.S., there has been strong public sentiment, both for and against ratification of the treaties, but the senate ratified the neutrality treaty Thursday.

"First of all," said Robinson-Hinds when we talked in the Memorial Union, "my opinion is just an opinion. The population of Panama is about 1,800,000 and I am just one person."

About the group of American people who are against the treaties, he said, "I think some of them would not have that idea if they were better informed about the U.S. role within the Republic of Panama and the Panama Canal.

LEASED, NOT BOUGHT

"Something that has kind of surprised me are the arguments some of the people who are complaining against the treaties use. For example, there is a group that says the canal was bought fair and square. It seems to me they have not really read the (old) treaty, because no part of the treaty says the land on which the canal was built was sold to the U.S. government.

"So it's surprising when lawyers, senators, governors, attorneys general use statements like those.

"The word, in my judgment, that would fit it best is 'lease.' I cannot quote the article in the treaty, but the first article says something to that effect. Those five miles on each side of the strip for the canal were leased to the U.S. for the purpose of building, constructing, maintaining, defending and operating the Panama Canal.

"There was just one point within that treaty that says this lease is for eternity or perpetuity, which cannot be today in international law. You cannot sell or lease part of a country for eternity.

"The other part to look on is that when the treaty was signed, Panama was a very, very young nation—very poor, weak and vastly uneducated—and that the people who did the major part of the negotiations, if you could call it that, were not even Panamanian. They were members of the French construction company that was trying to salvage some of its investment. To my knowledge when the primary representative came to the United States to sign the treaty, the treaty was already signed. They just handed him a copy.

"So now that the small nation of Panama has learned and has grown and matured to some extent, they have realized they could have a major role in the operation because it is in our country."

"Some people have the belief that the Republic of Panama gained importance because of the construction of the canal in 1903, but a little history would let us know that long before that the Isthmus was very important to the American continent and the European continent because it was a convenient way for Spain to get to its gold mines in South America and Peru in early colonial days, the 1800s and before.

"There had always been ideas of constructing some sort of a route across the Isthmus. There was a road first, because the ships found it very inefficient, to go all the way around South America to come to the other side. So they would come to the Atlantic coast of the Republic of Panama and then go by road across the southern coast and then by ship again down to South America and reverse that process.

"So, that's why the French began construction of the canal in 1855.

"Our prime source of economy is not the revenue from the canal company. Within the Republic of Panama are other prime interests, such as the international airport, a major stop for the vast majority of airline routes because of its geographical position, not only because of the existence of the canal. Also, we have a free zone here, commercial fishing and agriculture."

The Panama Canal runs south and southeast from Limon Bay at Colon, on the Atlantic, to the Bay of Panama, at Balboa on the Pacific.

The canal was built by the U.S. between 1904–14 on territory leased in perpetuity from the Republic of Panama.

In 1903, Panama revolted against Colombia and gained independence. Invoking the treaty of 1848 the U.S. sent a warship to Panama, preventing Colombian troops from quelling the outbreak.

Wilfredo noted that there is a faction in the Panama Canal community, Americans and Panamanians who work for the canal company, who would not like to lose "a sort of privileged atmosphere," but he adds that of the work force of about 16,000 people, between 11,000 and 12,000 are Panamanians and the rest Americans, as apart from the soldiers and civilian personnel.

Asked why the Panamanians want new treaties, he said the treaties are not a new idea, "Signs of wanting a new agreement, or at least wanting to negotiate the previous agreement to better terms, have been popping up for a very long time, probably before I was born.

GOVERNING PROBLEMS

"I could state several reasons. For example, the way in which the so-called Canal Zone is operated and governed. It has created some differences and problems within the Republic of Panama."

Panamanian children in the Canal Zone were taught in English, up until 8 or 10 years ago, Wilfredo said. "Although they were Panamanian citizens these people were never really incorporated to the Panamanian nationality, because they lived apart.

"This has a psychological effect on some of these people, who have begun to believe they are American citizens. Nothing is wrong with that, but some of them have begun to deny their nationality. The United States government, I think, cannot recognize them as U.S. citizens, contrary to the children of those American workers who were born in the Canal Zone.

"Another problem could be they are not getting sufficient economic benefit from the operation of the canal. Until lately, Panamanian employees of the Panama Canal Co. have had only lower paying jobs. The operation of the property is by the United States. We know that. They built it. But, if two men are doing the same job they should get the same benefits."

We suggested that some of the "cons" fuel that ratification of the treaties will mean Americans will get kicked out of the Canal Zone entirely and that they worry, too, about getting warships through the canal in the event of emergencies.

PRIVILEGED PASSAGE

"I don't think that is true," the Panamanian replied. "As far as I understand it, the new treaty would establish that after the year 2000 most of the operation, if not all, would be in the hands of the Panamanian government. I think, also, the strip of land called the Canal Zone would not exist anymore. But, I would not look at it as being 'kicked out.'

"Because," he continued, "that agreement is established that the United States would have privileged passage through the canal and also would have priority in the case of emergencies or wars. Also, the treaty establishes an agreement by which the U.S. would fortify the Panamanian military capability for them to offer significant means of protections and defense of the Panama Canal.

"The prime issue here is that the U.S. government believes and I agree with it, that if they negotiate a treaty that is to the satisfaction of the Panamanian government and people, then the fear of defending the canal against sabotage, or whatever, is very negligible.

"Because the treaty is to our benefit, there would be no strong parties within the country that would attempt to do anything, like crippling the canal. Some people interpret this as a threat, saying that if the treaty is not negotiated to Panama's satisfaction, then we would try to sabotage. That's not true.

"What would happen is that the nations of the world would make use of the uncomfortable situation between Panama and the United States, in other words try to infiltrate to break out a big sore in the Republic of Panama, like they have done in Vietnam, Korea, Cuba, Angola, and Ethiopia.

NOT A DICTATOR

"The Panamanian people don't want that. That's something the people of the U.S. should know. They may look at us as a small, poor country, that is looking for support anywhere and that if we can't get it from the United States we'll go to Communists. That's not really true.

"We've lived a Republican and Democratic life all of our lives and to change our lifestyles to Socialist or Communist would be a very hard blow."

Asked about General Torrijos, Wilfredo said it hurts him when Torrijos is called a dictator, comparing him to Castro or Idi Amin. He agrees that Torrijos is powerful. "Because he was the sponsor of the revolution in 1968 . . . the powers give him the authority to override some decisions within the government machinery. But he doesn't dictate laws. We have a constitution and we abide by that constitution.

"The treaty will be carried out. I have no reason to believe that it won't, because, as a matter of fact, if it is not respected I would see a lot of harm to the Panamanian nation and the Panamanian people.

"We can not survive without aid not only from the United States but from Latin American neighbors.

"I think that because of the importance of the relationship between the two nations (U.S. and Panama), the U.S. people should have been informed more thoroughly and more properly. It is because of the group that is contrary to the treaty that the people have been misled in public opinion of the uncertainty of Panama people's integrity and the integrity of the government.

"I feel personally there is no doubt in the high officials of the U.S. government and the responsible ones that the treaty is the best thing.

"I believe they know best and that they'll do everything to get the treaty ratified because they know what it would mean if it was not ratified. There would be deterioration of relations not only with Panama but with other Latin American countries.

"I feel it will be approved—not without a very strong and high battle in the Senate. And probably even after approval there will be a lot of backfire and bad names." ●

NEUTRON BOMB

(The following proceedings occurred during the debate on the Panama Canal Treaty and are printed at this point in the RECORD by unanimous consent.)

Mr. NUNN. Mr. President, I am dismayed over reports in this morning's New York's Times that the administration will shortly announce a decision not to produce enhanced radiation weapons. I would hope that the Times is incorrect, and I would urge the President to make an affirmative decision with respect to the so-called neutron bomb.

A decision not to proceed with its production would represent the successful culmination of one of the most vigorous Soviet propaganda campaigns in recent history. It would also constitute a victory for those on both sides of the Atlantic who have sought to fan the flames of popular hysteria over a weapon whose development represents the achievement of a long-standing NATO goal.

The spectacle of a timid and indecisive NATO leadership prepared to capitulate to the irrationality of those who seek to cripple the Alliance is not a becoming one.

For years, NATO has sought to reverse the declining credibility of its theater nuclear deterrent by reducing the collateral damage which would inevitably accompany the use of its existing nuclear weapons. Development of enhanced radiation weapons was undertaken precisely for this purpose, and has been strongly supported by the Alliance's own nuclear planning group, NATO's supreme commander Gen. Alexander Haig, Secretary of Defense Harold Brown, and the Joint Chiefs of Staff. The destructiveness of NATO's current nuclear weapons is so great that NATO is likely to be deterred from ever employing them in defense of its own territory.

As I stated on the floor of the Senate last July, the purpose of deterrence in Europe is to deter Soviet aggression, not to deter ourselves from responding to that aggression. A unilateral cancellation of the neutron bomb would be the ultimat in self-deterrence. The Soviets are not deterred by NATO weapons which the alliance probably cannot use for fear of destroying the very territory it is sworn to defend. The Soviets are deterred by weapons whose use is credible. If we do not have usable weapons, then we do not have deterrence, and if we do not have deterrence, we may end up being forced to use unusable weapons or to capitulate. This was and remains the logic underlying the neutron bomb. This weapon will not cure NATO's many problems. It is a small step in the right direction, but a highly symbolic step.

As I also pointed out last July, the neutron bomb program comprised but one element of a much broader theater nuclear force modernization program initiated by NATO several years ago. A decision to kill the enhanced radiation warhead also jeopardizes this program. A NATO willing to succumb to pressures to block production of the neutron bomb is a NATO which may also be willing to succumb to opposition to other improvements in the alliance's theater nuclear force posture, such as programs to enhance the survivability and increase the range of delivery systems.

In short, Mr. President, I believe that a decision not to produce enhanced radiation weapons not only risks torpedoing the alliance's long overdue theater nuclear force modernization program, but would also place in the minds of the Soviets, the image of a timid and hesitant America which lacks the courage to confront the difficult defense choices ahead.

What other interpretation can the Kremlin place upon a unilateral decision to give up a weapon which would contribute significantly to restoring the military balance in Europe? What other interpretation can the Kremlin place upon a unilateral decision to forswear a promising military technology without asking for reciprocal restraint on the part of the Soviet Union? What other interpretation can the Kremlin place upon a decision which goes against the strong advice of the Secretary of Defense, NATO's supreme commander, and the Joint Chiefs of Staff?

If the President has made a decision not to go forward with enhanced radiation weapons, I would urge him to reconsider his decision.

Mr. President, that completes my remarks.

I thank my colleague from New York for yielding to me for this extraneous speech on a subject that is not now before the Senate but one which we debated long and hard last summer and which I think is of great importance not only to our Nation but also to the overall NATO alliance.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. The Senator from New York was happy to do so and begs to suggest that the subject of the speech of the Senator from Georgia is not in the least extraneous to this debate.

May I also at this point offer my own thoughts that what the Senator has said has been listened to and will be read with great interest and concern by Members of the Senate who attended the most careful and thoughtful debate on this matter last summer, a closed session of the Senate, which was characterized by a very thorough and almost prayerful consideration of this matter. We now read in the newspapers that somehow the American policy has suddenly changed, without any indication that this kind of shift was about to take place and with no suggestion that in the negotiations over arms and strategic forces this decision would bring about some general lessening of military tensions. If that were possible, if for our giving up something the others gave up something as well, one can seriously entertain that thought and indeed welcome it, if it is significant.

Mr. NUNN. The Senator is entirely correct. If we asked the Soviet Union to restrain themselves on the SS–20 missile, which threatens all of Europe, and asked them to take out about 10,000 tanks, which is really what is distorting the overall balance in Europe today, their offensive power, their huge offensive power, if we had gotten quid pro quo for this decision, it would be entirely different.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. The Senator from New York just wishes to say that perhaps the Senator from Georgia is not aware that evidently there is no such thing as an SS–20 missile. A number of Senators have just returned from the International Parliamentary Union meeting in Lisbon where a proposal was made by the Soviet Union that we do not deploy and develop the neutron bomb. Our representative said, "What do you say we include in this resolution the proposal that the Soviets not develop and deploy the SS–20?"

The Soviet delegate said, "There is no such thing as an SS–20."

We said: "If there is no such thing, surely there is no great harm in not deploying it."

"That is different," they said; "that is a very different thing. One must have an absolute right to deploy that which does not exist."

We are dealing with a totalitarian, expansionist, imperialistic power that will take every advantage of our weakness, that denies to its own citizens its possession of weapons of mass destruction when all the world knows about it. It insists upon a fiction.

Is that not the case?

Mr. NUNN. I would certainly agree with the Senator from New York. I did not know the Soviets had taken a position that there was no such thing as an SS–20. I am being enlightened today and, perhaps, our intelligence sources and all the information we have will be revised in light of the Soviet message.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. In light of the photographs, there is something enormous going on in that country.

Mr. NUNN. There is something going on, and what is going on is that the Soviets are acquiring a very significant offensive potential in Europe.

The neutron enhanced radiation weapon is a defensive weapon. No one can make it out as anything other than that. It is to try to counter some of the buildup the Soviet Union and the Warsaw Pact nations have made over the last several years, and now we are giving up a defensive weapon unilaterally, as I understand it—at least that is what is being talked about in the news media—without any quid pro quo, without any decision to produce, and to table this in the MBFR talks which, if we go ahead with production, might be appropriate.

Of course, it does not do any good to table this kind of proposal in the MBFR talks unless one goes ahead with production so we have some very tangible signal that we are going to go forward unless there is a quid pro quo. But I find this discussion dismaying, frankly.

Mr. MOYNIHAN. I thank the Senator.

(This concludes proceedings which occurred earlier.)

Mr. BARTLETT said earlier. Mr.

President, I ask unanimous consent that at the end of the division of time, I be given 8 minutes to speak on another matter.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(Conclusion of earlier request.)

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour of 6 o'clock having arrived, under the previous order, the Senator from Oklahoma is recognized for 8 minutes.

DECISION NOT TO PRODUCE THE NEUTRON WARHEAD

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, I am alarmed at recent press reports that the President of the United States will announce this week that he has decided not to place the enhanced radiation/reduced blast warhead into production. Such a decision is not in the best interests of the United States or her European allies. This low-yield, enhanced radiation (ER) warhead—called by many people a neutron bomb—was designed to counter massive Warsaw Pact ground forces which threaten Western Europe. Tanks and armored personnel carriers in these Warsaw Pact forces are equipped to operate in a radiological and chemical warfare environment and are sheltered against many of the heat, blast, and fallout effects of our present nuclear weapons.

Thus the Soviet Union and its Warsaw Pact allies are so superior to NATO forces in conventional warfare capability and radiological defenses that NATO, even with the use of present American tactical nuclear weapons stationed in Europe might not be able to prevent a surprise Soviet Union attack on Western Europe from achieving a quick and sudden victory.

In the desperate process of deploying our tactical nuclear weapons of older technology, we run the risk of devastating Europe in the process of defending it. By reducing collateral damage to land and populations around the battlefield while at the same time effectively destroying enemy armored formations at specific locations, the ER warhead makes both conventional and nuclear war less likely.

Emotionalism surrounding the enhanced radiation warhead has confused its purpose. The enhanced radiation warhead does not increase the destructiveness of our tactical nuclear weapons, it lowers it. ER weapons designed to attack targets now designated for our older tactical nuclear weapons will be smaller and will produce less heat, blast and fallout. Levels of immediate radiation will be about the same.

Even with the enhanced radiation warhead, the United States will rely mainly on its conventional forces to deter Soviet aggression against NATO. Nevertheless, theater nuclear weapons help deter conventional war because the Soviet Union cannot be sure that the West would not use nuclear weapons to defeat a surprise conventional attack. An improved American theater nuclear force is a more credible deterrent to the use of theater nuclear weapons by the Soviet Union.

Opponents of the enhanced radiation warhead are not all driven by emotionalism, although the degree of unclear thinking on this issue is probably greater than has been seen on any controversial defense issue in the last 20 years. Some opponents argue that the enhanced radiation/reduced blast warhead will lower the nuclear threshold because the President of the United States would be more likely to use this less destructive weapon. There is little evidence to support this view.

The use of the enhanced radiation warhead would be every bit as much a quantum leap above a conventional defense of Europe as would be the use of our present tactical nuclear weapons.

This view was taken by President Carter himself in a letter to Chairman JOHN STENNIS on July 11, 1977. I quote:

> The decision to use nuclear weapons of any kind, including ER weapons, would remain in my hands, not in the hands of local theater commanders. A decision to cross the nuclear threshold would be the most agonizing to be made by any President. I can assure you that these weapons would not make that decision any easier. But by enhancing deterrence, they could make it less likely that I would have to face such a decision.

The decision to begin a nuclear war would be difficult both for the United States and for the Soviet Union. Nevertheless, it is strange that the opponents of the enhanced radiation/reduced blast warhead are so preoccupied with the fear that the United States will lower the nuclear threshold that they have not considered the degree to which crossing the nuclear threshold is a decision largely in the hands of the Soviet Union.

I find it inconceivable that NATO would launch a surprise attack into Eastern Europe, with or without the use of nuclear weapons. In fact, there is some doubt that NATO would decide to use nuclear weapons even in its own defense. It is the Soviet Union which would decide whether to begin a war in Europe with or without a nuclear attack, and it is the Soviet Union which would decide whether to risk driving the West to the wall forcing NATO to retaliate with nuclear weapons. All that NATO can do is simply make it as difficult as possible for the Soviet Union to make these decisions in the affirmative. The enhanced radiation warhead increases our deterrence, while reducing the destruction which would result if that deterrence should fail.

If it is decided not to produce the enhanced radiation/reduced blast warhead, this will be another example of the President of the United States taking a unilateral disarmament step, under pressure from a small constituency, which undermines the defenses of the United States and her allies and at the same time achieves no corresponding concessions from the Soviet Union. This particular act of unilateral arms control is made worse by the fact that we have no way of knowing whether or not the Soviet Union has neutron weapons, is developing neutron weapons, or intends to develop and deploy neutron weapons. What we do know is that the United States and her NATO allies need this weapon to counter the existing Warsaw Pact threat to Western Europe.

If the President decides not to produce the enhanced radiation warhead, it will be widely interpreted as one more example of America's lack of will to counter the rising Soviet threat.

APPOINTMENT BY THE VICE PRESIDENT

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair, on behalf of the Vice President, appoints the Senator from New Hampshire (Mr. MCINTYRE) as a congressional adviser to the SALT delegation in Geneva during 1978.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGE REFERRED

As in executive session, the Presiding Officer laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States submitting the nomination of Robert J. Sugarman, of Pennsylvania, to be a Commissioner on the part of the United States on the International Joint Commission, United States and Canada, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS

A message from the President of the United States stated that on March 27, 1978, he had approved and signed the following acts:

S. 833. An act for the relief of Ah Young Cho Kwak;

S. 1135. An act for the relief of Youngsoon Choi; and

S. 1671. An act to designate the Absaroka-Beartooth Wilderness, Custer and Gallatin National Forests, in the State of Montana.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

At 4:15 p.m., a message from the House of Representatives delivered by Mr. Hackney, one of its reading clerks, announced that the House has agreed to the concurrent resolution (S. Con. POM–560. A resolution adopted by the National Cowboy Hall of Fame and Western Heritage Center, relating to the Metric Conversion Act of 1975; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation.

POM–561. A resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Alabama; to the Committee on Commerce, Science, and Transportation:

"H.R. 30

"Whereas, laws and regulations of the United States government have pressured the State of Alabama into restricting motor vehicle speed on Interstate Highways to a maximum of fifty-five miles per hour, under the threat that the federal government would otherwise withhold highway funds from the State; and

"Whereas, fifty-five miles per hour is too slow for Interstate Highways; and

"Whereas, drivers become bored, sleepy, and careless at this excessively low speed; and

"Whereas, the energy saved by this low speed limit is counterbalanced by the time lost; and

"Whereas, Americans' time is as precious as their petroleum; now therefore

"Be it resolved by the House of Representatives of the State of Alabama, That we urge the legislative and executive branches of the United States government to adopt all measures necessary to allow the State of Alabama to increase to sixty-five miles per hour the maximum speed limit on Interstate Highways within this State.

"Be it further resolved, That copies of this resolution be sent to the President of the United States and to the entire Alabama Congressional Delegation and to the Clerk of the House and the Secretary of the Senate of the United States Congress."

POM–562. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Wyoming; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources:

"JOINT RESOLUTION NO. 2

"A joint resolution calling for the Congress of the United States to take appropriate action to require the National Park Service to adhere to the intent of Public Law 95–42 regarding land acquisitions; to require the National Park Service to rescind unwanted parts of its land acquisition directives; to stay condemnation proceedings commenced under these directives; and to make restitution to landowners who have lost normal rights of property ownership

"Be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Wyoming:

"Whereas, the Ninety-Fifth Congress of the United States, through the enactment of Public Law 95–42 in 1977, made funds available to purchase private lands within the boundaries of the nation's national parks from willing sellers; and

"Whereas, The National Park Service has ignored restrictions within Public Law 95–42 in an overzealous attempt to acquire private lands without the consent of the landowners; and

"Whereas, The National Park Service has harshly exercised its right to eminent domain to acquire private property within the boundaries of Grand Teton National Park, including parts of the Town of Kelly, Wyoming; and

"Whereas, the guidelines for implementing this land acquisition program are directives from the Director of the National Park Service, which directives are extreme in their arbitrary and capricious nature, are contrary to traditional patterns in business relations between private citizens and governmental agencies and set dangerous precedents which could be used broadly by other governmental agencies; and

"Whereas, the application of these guidelines is creating undue hardship and embarrassment to Wyoming citizens in a manner not proper nor easily protested except through the courts, which remedy involves high costs thereby prohibiting its use to most common landowners.

"Now, Therefore, be it resolved by the Legislature of the State of Wyoming, that the Congress of the United States is requested to take appropriate action to require governmental agencies to adhere to the intent of the law specifically, and to the Constitution of the United States generally;

"It is further resolved that Congress is requested to order the Director of the National Park Service to rescind unwanted parts of the land acquisition directives and to advise all interested parties of the willingness to buy land and of the willingness to negotiate on the basis of values established by a free and unlimited market place;

"It is further resolved that Congress is requested to stay condemnation proceedings commenced under the directives of the Director of the National Park Service and to make full restitution to those landowners who have lost the normal rights of property ownership;

"It is further resolved that copies of this resolution be transmitted by the Secretary of State to the President of the United States, to the presiding officers of each House of the Congress of the United States, to the Secretary of the Interior, to each Senator and Representative from Wyoming in the Congress of the United States and to each State Legislature of the several Western States in the Union."

POM–563. A resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Kentucky; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works:

"RESOLUTION

"A concurrent resolution requesting the United States Congress to enact legislation prohibiting the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers from applying the benefit/cost ratio to flood control projects in the Commonwealth of Kentucky

"Whereas, during the past 5 years there have been 85 floods in Kentucky causing actual damages amounting to $181,848,000 according to the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers; and

"Whereas, it is estimated that the floods of April 4–7, 1977 caused property damages well over $100,000,000 to 15 southeastern Kentucky counties and took the lives of 10 persons; and

"Whereas, it is estimated that the floods of April 4–7, 1977 injured 2,255 persons, caused property losses to 9,715 families, and destroyed or severely damaged 4,507 homes and businesses; and

"Whereas, the large number of floods, the actual damages caused by the floods, and the sociological damages to persons requiring rehabilitation or relocation evidence the necessity for immediate design and construction of flood control measures to prevent or reduce future damages from floods in the Commonwealth; and

"Whereas, the benefit/cost ratio can be arbitrarily applied so that costs exceed benefits and deny construction of flood control measures for counties of the Commonwealth subject to flooding;

"Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate of the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, the House of Representatives concurring therein:

"Section 1. That the United States Congress is hereby requested to enact legislation prohibiting the U.S. Army Corps of Engineers, when determining the necessity for flood control measures, from applying the benefit/cost ratio to flood control projects in the Commonwealth of Kentucky.

"Sec. 2. That the Clerk be directed to send copies of this resolution to the President of the Senate, Speaker of the House, and members of the Kentucky delegation of the United States Congress."

POM–564. A resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts; to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

"RESOLUTION

"Resolutions memorializing Congress and the President of the United States in opposition to the sale of armaments to Egypt and Saudi Arabia

"Whereas, History has shown that you cannot buy friendship of nations with money or weapons, that arms are bought to be used—not stored, that peace lies in the hearts of men not in the arsenals of wars, that morality—not the short-term values of the marketplace—provide the best hope for peace, that our nation endangers its own integrity when it strays from its promises to its allies; now therefore be it.

"Resolved, That the Massachusetts Senate, alarmed that the United States appears to be running out on its commitment of support for Israel, disturbed that executive agencies of the United States have offered to sell our most modern weapons including F–5's and F–15's to Egypt and Saudi Arabia, a move that threatens to upset the balance of power in the Middle East and engulf that region in yet another war that could destroy Israel, a tiny island of free enterprise democracy in an ocean of fascistic and communistic states, does hereby implore the President and the Congress of the United States to block such proposed sale; and be it further.

"Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be transmitted forthwith to the President of the United States, the presiding officer of each branch of the Congress and to the National Association of Jewish Legislators."

POM–565. A resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of California; to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

"SENATE RESOLUTION No. 43

"Relative to the recent terrorist attack upon Israeli civilians

"Whereas, The killing of 37 Israeli civilians and the wounding of 70 other civilians in a terrorist raid by the Palestine Liberation Organization on the outskirts of Tel Aviv is a criminal outrage against world peace; and

"Whereas, This criminal act spotlights the impossibility of expecting peace by carving out of Israel a homeland for guerrillas and terrorists who would be within minutes of Israeli's capital; and

"Whereas, Many Californians annually visit the State of Israel, a small nation which includes within its borders holy shrines for three major religious faiths, Judaism, Christianity, and Islam; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That the Senate of the State of California does hereby express its condolences and sympathy to the families of those murdered and calls upon our administration and Congress in Washington to recognize the peril to world peace in forcing Israel to accept as a precondition to negotiations between Egypt and Israel the creation of a homeland for PLO guerrillas and terrorists within its heartland."

POM–566. A resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of New Jersey; to the Committee on Foreign Relations:

"SENATE RESOLUTION

"Whereas, History has shown that you cannot buy friendship of nations with money or weapons, that arms are bought to be used, not stored; that peace lies in the hearts of men not in arsenals of war; that mortality, not the short-term values of the marketplace, provide the best hope for peace; and that our Nation endangers its own integrity when it strays from its promises to its allies; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate of the State of New Jersey:

"This House is alarmed that the United States appears to be running out on its commitment of support for Israel and disturbed that the executive agencies of the United States have offered to sell our most modern weapons, including F–5s and F–15s, to Egypt and Saudi Arabia, a move that threatens to upset the balance of power in the Middle East and engulf that region in yet another war that could destroy Israel, a tiny island of free enterprise democracy in an ocean of totalitarian states, and does hereby call on the Congress of the United States to block such proposed sale. Be it further:

"Resolved, That duly authenticated copies of this resolution be transmitted to the Vice President of the United States and the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, and to each of the members of Congress elected from this State."

POM–567. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Virginia; to the Committee on Human Resources:

"SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION No. 33

"Memorializing the President, Congress and the Secretary of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare to desist from advocating or supporting policies and programs which have as an objective the elimination of tobacco use and production

"Whereas, the farming of tobacco is a cornerstone of the Virginia agricultural economy, supplying a high standard of living to over forty thousand farm families in the Commonwealth and providing approximately one hundred and sixty-four million dollars worth of gross income to such persons; and

"Whereas, an additional fifty thousand persons are employed in the processing and manufacturing of tobacco products in the Commonwealth; and

"Whereas, the port of Hampton Roads is the largest mover of tobacco products of any port in the world, generating over seven hundred eighty-four million dollars worth of tobacco related revenue; and

"Whereas, all states tax tobacco and derive considerable revenue from such taxes to support beneficial public programs; and

"Whereas, the Secretary of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare has embarked on an expensive and counter-productive attack on tobacco, an industry of vital importance to this Commonwealth and to the nation; and

"Whereas, the elimination of the tobacco industry would cause serious national repercussions, creating an adverse effect on the national balance of payments and eliminating over two and one-half billion dollars of United States Treasury revenues at a time when such money is needed from any available source; now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the Senate, the House of Delegates concurring, That the President of the United States, Congress of the United States and the Secretary of the Department of Health, Education and Welfare are hereby memorialized to desist from advocating or supporting policies and programs which have as an objective the elimination of tobacco use and production; and, be it

"Resolved further, That the Clerk of the House of Delegates is directed to send copies of this Resolution to the President of the United States, the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, the President of the United States Senate and the members of the Virginia delegation to the Congress of the United States in order that they may be apprised of the sense of this Body."

POM–568. A resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Georgia; to the Committee on the Judiciary:

"H.R. No. 836

"A resolution requesting the Congress of the United States to take certain actions respecting the freedom of religion in permitting prayer in the public schools; and for other purposes

"Whereas, a fundamental principle upon which this nation was founded was the freedom to completely exercise one's religious beliefs and convictions unrestrained by any action of the government; and

"Whereas, this principle was adhered to for almost two hundred years, in permitting the free and unrestrained opportunity for prayer in the public schools, before the United States Supreme Court arbitrarily and unreasonably ruled that prayer had no place in the public schools; and

"Whereas, just as there can be no true freedom of religion without education, there can be no true education without an exposure to and understanding of faith and the role of the Almighty in our lives; and

"Whereas, the great majority of Georgia parents desire that their children be reared so that regular exposure to religious principles is part of their daily lives; and

Whereas, every school child should have the opportunity, but not be compelled, to hear Scripture and prayer each school day.

Now, therefore, be it resolved by the House of Representatives that this body hereby calls on the Congress of the United States to provide, by appropriate legislation, for the hearing of Scripture and prayer in public schools for those children desiring this opportunity.

"Be it further resolved that the Clerk of the House of Representatives is hereby directed to transmit appropriate copies of this resolution to the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives and the Vice President of the United States."

POM–569. A resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Kentucky; to the Committee on the Judiciary:

"HOUSE RESOLUTION No. 20

"A joint resolution to withdraw the ratification by the Kentucky General Assembly of the proposed 27th amendment to the Constitution of the United States, relative to equal rights for men and women

"Whereas, at the First Extraordinary Session of 1972, the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, by Joint Resolution, ratified an amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by House Joint Resolution 208 of the Ninety-Second Congress (Second Session), proposing the 27th amendment to the Constitution of the United States, relative to equal rights for men and women and reading as follows:

"Joint Resolution Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled (two-thirds of each House concurring therein), that the following article is proposed as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the Constitution when ratified by the legislatures of three-fourths of the several States within seven years from the date of its submission by the Congress:

"Section 1. Equality of rights under law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any state on account of sex.

"Sec. 2. The Congress shall have the power to enforce by appropriate legislation the provisions of this article.

"Sec. 3. This amendment shall take effect two years after the date of ratification.

"Whereas, it is the desire of the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky that the Joint Resolution of the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky ratifying the amendment be withdrawn; Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky:

"Section 1. That the ratification of the proposed 27th amendment to the Constitution of the United States, relative to equal rights for men and women, effected for Kentucky by the adoption of House Joint Resolution 2 at the First Extraordinary Session of 1972 of the Kentucky General Assembly, is withdrawn the action of the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky thereon is hereby rescinded, and House Joint Resolution 2 is repealed.

"Sec. 2. That copies of this resolution, duly certified by the Secretary of State of the Commonwealth of Kentucky with the Great Seal of Kentucky attached thereo, be sent to the Administrator of General Services of the United States, Washington, D. C. to the President of the Senate and to the Speaker of the House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States. The Secretary of State of this Commonwealth shall also cause certified copies of the resolution to be sent to the Governor of each of the United States.

"Whereas, the official records of the Secretary of State reflect the fact that the Governor of the Commonwealth of Kentucky is "absent from the State" within the meaning of section 84 of the Constitution of Kentucky, and

"Whereas, in such circumstances, it becomes incumbent upon the Lieutenant Governor to discharge the duties of the office of the Governor.

"Now, therefore, HJR 20, 1978 Regular Session of the General Assembly of Kentucky should be and it hereby is vetoed.

"Conformable to the requirements of Section 88 of the Constitution of Kentucky the objects and reasons for the veto of HJR 20 are:

"(1) It is not in the best interest of the people of the Commonwealth of Kentucky;

"(2) The General Assembly of Kentucky was powerless to rescind the action previously it had taken on the identical subject matters of HJR 20.

"(3) The manner in which HJR 20 obtained concurrence by both Houses of the General Assembly were illegal."

POM–570. A joint resolution adopted by the Legislature of the State of Alabama; to the Committee on the Judiciary:

"H.J.R. 66

"Urging the United States Congress to reject proposals for extending the time for Ratification of the ERA amendment

"Whereas, never before in our nation's history has any amendment to the United States Constitution taken longer than three years to be ratified, the purpose of such limitation to obtain a consensus of the majority view within a reasonably current timeframe; and

"Whereas, it is obvious that this consensus has yet to be received even within the longest period of time heretofore taken to ratify an amendment; and

"Whereas, this body and, in our opinion, the majority of the citizens of our state are vehemently opposed to any extension of time for ratification of the ERA amendment; now therefore "Be it resolved by the legislature of Alabama, both Houses thereof concurring, That we strongly urge the Congress of the United States to promptly and soundly reject any proposal to extend the time for ratification of the ERA amendment to the U.S. Constitution.

"Be it further resolved, That a copy of this resolution be sent to each House of the United States Congress and a copy also to each member of the Alabama Congressional Delegation in Washington, D.C."

POM–571. A joint memorial adopted by the Legislature of the State of Idaho; to the Committee on Governmental Affairs:

"SENATE JOINT MEMORIAL No. 117

"A joint memorial to the President of the United States, Jimmy Carter, the Secretary of the Department of Agriculture, Robert S. Bergland, the Secretary of the Department of Interior, Cecil D. Andrus, the Senate and House of Representatives in the Congress of the United States, and the Senators and Representatives representing the State of Idaho in the Congress of the United States

"We, your Memorialists, the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Idaho assembled in the Second Regular Session of the Forty-fourth Idaho Legislature, do hereby respectfully represent that:

"Whereas, the Soil Conservation Service, established in 1935 within the Department of Agriculture, was created and designed to serve the interests of the public by providing technical service and assistance to the public on private lands through local soil conservation districts; and

"Whereas, this pattern of service to the public has grown and prospered through more than forty years and provides an excellent delivery system of service to soil, water and related natural resource problems, not only in Idaho, but to all fifty states; and

"Whereas, this operation of the Soil Conservation Service and Department of Agriculture has developed realistic working relations, at the local field level, with the fifty-one soil conservation districts in Idaho and almost three thousand such districts nationwide; and

"Whereas, the 95th Congress passed amendments to the Federal Water Quality Act (PL 95–217) committing the Department of Agriculture, Soil Conservation Service and other agencies in the Department of Agriculture to provide additional assistance and service to clean water programs, through soil conservation districts and state soil conservation commissions; and

"Whereas, removing the Soil Conservation Service from the Department of Agriculture would destroy PL 95–217, adversely affecting existing cooperative working relations and service and delivery systems to the local soil conservation districts at the grass roots level where all good conservation practices must take place; and

"Whereas, proposals are now under consideration to transfer the Soil Conservation Service from the Department of Agriculture to the Department of Interior or some other agency; and

"Whereas, we believe the present structure has served well for more than four decades and we urge the Congress to carefully consider this long history of service and the many conservation accomplishments.

"Now, therefore, be it resolved by the members of the Second Regular Session of the Forty-fourth Idaho Legislature, the Senate and the House of Representatives concurring therein, that we urge the Congress of the United States and the President to reject proposals for transfer of the Soil Conservation Service from the Department of Agriculture.

"Be it further resolved that the Secretary of the Senate be, and she is hereby authorized and directed to forward copies of this Memorial to the President of the United States, Jimmy Carter, the Secretary of the Department of Agriculture, Robert S. Bergland, the Secretary of the Department of Interior, Cecil D. Andrus, the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives of Congress, and the honorable congressional delegation representing the State of Idaho in the Congress of the United States."

POM–572. A joint memorial adopted by the Legislature of the State of Idaho; to the Committee on Banking, Housing, and Urban Affairs:

"SENATE JOINT MEMORIAL No. 114

"A joint memorial to the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Department of Housing and Urban Development, the Congress of the United States, and to the Senators and Representatives representing the State of Idaho in the Congress of the United States regarding regional development

"We, your Memorialists, the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Idaho assembled in the Second Regular Session of the Forty-fourth Idaho Legislature, do hereby respectfully represent that:

"Whereas, the federal government is developing proposals for a federal urban policy with specific recommendations for ways to help cities; and

"Whereas, these proposals include the establishment of criteria for federal review and certification of local and regional development strategies designed to achieve national goals in housing, employment and economic stability; and

"Whereas, cities would be required to develop such certified strategies in order to qualify for the receipt of certain federal revenues; and

"Whereas, this proposal will have the effect of strengthening large metropolitan regions at the expense of our nation's smaller cities and rural areas; and

"Whereas, we believe that local goals in Idaho are best established at the local level.

"Now, therefore, be it resolved by the members of the Second Regular Session of the Forty-fourth Idaho Legislature, the Senate and the House of Representatives concurring therein, that we urge the President and the Congress to reject any proposal which would mandate federal criteria for the development of any sort of State, local or regional development strategies or make establishment of such strategies a criteria for receiving federal revenues at the state or local level.

"Be it further resolved that the Secretary of the Senate be, and she is hereby authorized and directed to forward copies of this Memorial to the President of the United States, the Secretary of the Department of Housing and Urban Development, to the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House of Representatives of Congress and to the Senators and Representatives representing this State in the Congress of the United States."

POM–573. A joint memorial adopted by the Legislature of the State of Idaho; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources:

"SENATE JOINT MEMORIAL No. 112

"A joint memorial to the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled

"We, your Memorialists, the Senate and House of Representatives of the State of Idaho assembled in the Second Regular Session of the Forty-fourth Idaho Legislature, do respectfully represent that:

"Whereas, in 1950, we were virtually self-sufficient in oil; and

"Whereas, America's self-sufficiency in oil supply has been eroded since 1950, with oil imports rising from 23% in 1970, to 33% in 1972, to 44% in 1976; and

"Whereas, in 1970, we paid nearly three billion dollars for imported oil (or approximately $15.00 per person), and in 1976, this already staggering tribute to foreign oil suppliers increased to $35 billion, or $160 for every man, woman and child in this nation; and

"Whereas, the main dependable and available energy resources are coal and uranium; and

"Whereas, oil and natural gas represent 6% of our identified primary energy reserves but together constitute 75% of our energy consumption; and

"Whereas, on the other hand, coal is our most abundant fossil fuel with American coal reserves estimated at more than 1½ trillion tons—enough to last for 500 years; and

"Whereas, coal comprises 93% of our fuel reserves, yet supplies only 17% of our total energy requirements; and

"Whereas, solar energy and wind energy also represent potentially unlimited power resources deserving of vigorous development; and

"Whereas, the increased energy supplies available through the development of our water resources is even now being demonstrated through the use of low head turbines to generate hydroelectric power on previously unharnessed low-fall streams; and

"Whereas, as oil and natural gas shrink in supply and rise in price, the energy salvation of this nation must depend upon the maximum development and use of our coal and uranium reserves and the full realization of the energy potential present in the sun, the wind and our water resources.

"Now, therefore, be it resolved by the members of the Second Regular Session of the Forty-fourth Idaho Legislature, the Senate and House of Representatives concurring, that we most respectfully urge the Congress of the United States to act now to break the chains of dependence on foreign oil supplies.

"Be it further resolved that we most respectfully submit to the Congress of the United States that it must act immediately to promote and encourage the development of all sources of energy, with emphasis on coal and nuclear power, and further energy conservation if America's energy freedom is to be restored.

"Be it further resolved that the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby authorized and directed to forward copies of this Memorial to the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives of Congress, and to the Senators and Representatives representing this state in the Congress of the United States."

RECLAMATION SAFETY OF DAMS ACT OF 1978

● Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, I introduce today, at the request of the Department of the Interior, a bill to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct, restore, operate, and maintain new or modified features at existing Federal reclamation dams for safety of dams purposes.

I ask unanimous consent that the text of the bill, and the letter of transmittal with enclosure, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill and material were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2820

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act shall be cited as the "Reclamation Safety of Dams Act of 1978".

SEC. 2. In order to preserve the structural safety of Bureau of Reclamation dams and related facilities the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to perform such modifications as he determines to be reasonably required. Said performance of work shall be in accordance with the Federal reclamation laws (Act of June 17, 1902, 32 Stat. 388, and Acts amendatory or supplementary thereto).

SEC. 3. Construction authorized by this Act shall be for the purposes of dam safety and not for the specific purposes of providing additional conservation storage capacity or of developing benefits over and above those provided by the original dams and reservoirs. Nothing in this Act shall be construed to reduce the amount of project costs allocated to reimbursable purposes heretofore authorized.

SEC. 4. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated such sums as may be necessary to accomplish the purposes of this Act. All costs heretofore or hereafter incurred in the modification of dams to insure their safety from failure shall be allocated among the authorized purposes served by the dams and related reservoirs in accordance with standard cost allocation procedures: Provided, however, That costs allocated to irrigation shall be reimbursable to the extent of the water users' ability to repay as determined by the Secretary of the Interior in the light of their outstanding repayment obligations.

WASHINGTON, D.C.,
February 14, 1978.

HON. WALTER F. MONDALE,
President of the Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Enclosed is a draft of a bill "To authorize the Secretary of the Interior to construct, restore, operate, and maintain new or modified features at existing Federal reclamation dams for safety of dams purposes."

We strongly recommend that the bill be introduced and expeditiously passed.

The purpose of the draft bill is to authorize modification of Bureau of Reclamation dams for safety purposes.

In 1948, Reclamation's efforts to ensure that existing dams and reservoirs are operated and maintained safely led to the development of a formal program for periodic inspections of existing structures. Each dam is included in that program, entitled to Review of Maintenance Program, as soon as the dam has been transferred from construction to operation and maintenance status.

Under the Review of Maintenance Program, each dam is examined by Reclamation project and regional personnel at 2- or 3-year intervals, depending upon the nature of the facility. Specialists from Reclamation's Engineering and Research Center, Denver, Colorado, participate in the review of each dam at least once every 6 years.

A formal report on the condition of each dam and of its appurtenant structures, including recommended corrective actions, if any, is prepared after the examination and becomes a part of the permanent history of the dam's performance.

As the engineering profession develops new criteria and technology for the design of dams, it becomes necessary to reevaluate the safety of the older dams. In 1965, the Examination of Existing Structures Program was initiated to evaluate the ability of reclamation's older dams to withstand safely the current estimated maximum probable flood and to prescribe corrective action necessary to ensure the safety of the dams.

Initially, the Examination of Existing Structures Program focused on structural and hydrological aspects of the dams. New methodology for estimating floodflows made the review necessary. Later, the scope of the program was enlarged to include new methodologies for evaluating the response of dams to earthquakes, the effect of existing or potential landslides, and a review of the condition of upstream dams.

Under the Examination of Existing Structures Program, a formal report is prepared for each structure which the review identifies as having signficant deficiencies. The report includes information on the need for structural modification, the hazards to the public, the recommended corrective action and alternatives thereto, the environmental impacts, and the repayment ability of the water users. The completed reports are used as a basis for recommending corrective action.

Of the dams for which studies have been completed under the Examination of Existing Structures Program, major modifications have been completed at Boca and Clear Lake Dams (California) and Conconully Dam (Washington). Minor modifications (less than $250,000) have been completed at Bull (Wyoming), Gerber Dam (Oregon), and Vallecito Dam (Colorado).

Major work is authorized and is in progress on McMillan and Avalon Dams (Brantley Project, New Mexico), American Falls Dam (Idaho), and Belle Fourche Dam (South Dakota). Major work is authorized but has not been started on McKay Dam (Oregon) and Dickinson Dam (North Dakota).

As a result of studies completed to date, we have found 13 other dams which require structural modification to enable them to withstand safely the inflow design flood and/or the maximum credible earthquake. The names of the 13 dams, the project, State, modifications required, and estimated costs (January 1977 price level) are as follows (also refer to the attached fact sheets for each dam):

1. Deerfield Dam, Rapid Valley Project, South Dakota. Increase the height of the dam 16 feet and modify the spillway and dam outlet works. (The increase in dam height is the only feasible way of ensuring dam safety, and is not for the purpose of increasing operating capacity.) Estimated cost $1,092,000.

2. Lahontan Dam, Newlands Project, Nevada. Rehabilitate the spillway and outlet works and construct a concrete curtain wall in the dam crest. Estimated cost $5,070,000.

3. Hyrum Dam, Hyrum Project, Utah. Construct an auxiliary spillway. Estimated cost $810,000.

4. Stony Gorge Dam, Orland Project, California. Construct an auxiliary spillway. Estimated cost $2,600,000.

5. Gibson Dam, Sun River Project, Montana. Construct aeration piers and protect the downstream abutments by the installation of rockbolts. Estimated cost $962,000.

6. Black Canyon Dam, Boise Project, Idaho. Construct an auxiliary spillway. Estimated cost $3,250,000.

7. Altus Dam, W. C. Austin Project, Oklahoma. Lower the height of the north dike 1 foot, raise the height of the other dikes 2 feet, and construct a new dike. Estimated cost $858,000.

8. Theodore Roosevelt Dam, Salt River Project, Arizona. Increase the height of the dam 4 feet and modify the spillway. Estimated cost $1,209,000.

9. Stewart Mountain Dam, Salt River Project, Arizona. Modify the spillway. Estimated cost $6,760,000.

10. Jackson Lake Dam, Minidoka Project, Wyoming. Protect the dam against possible seismic events in the vicinity of the dam. Estimated cost $4,000,000.

11. Island Park Dam, Minidoka Project, Idaho. Modify the spillway and outlet works. Estimated cost $2,405,000.

12. Willow Creek Dam, Sun River Project, Montana. Construct a replacement spillway. Estimated cost $3,640,000.

13. East Park Dam, Orland Project, California. Construct a larger spillway. Estimated cost $3,900,000.

(Additional information on the above dams is provided on attached sheets).

Although the 13 dams are not in imminent danger of immediate failure, failure would be possible if a "maximum probable flood" were to occur upstream from those dams incapable of safely passing or storing such a flood or if the maximum credible earthquake occurred at those dams incapable of withstanding such an event.

(While the probability of such a flood occurring at a given site is small such floods have been known to occur. The term "maximum probable flood" is an engineering term generally defined as "the largest flood that theoretically could occur at a given site during our present geological and climatic era." The time frame for the probability of such a flood cannot be precisely estimated and would vary from site to site, but it is greater than 100 years, and usually considerably greater.)

The bill would provide general authority to undertake work on these dams, and on others when the need is discovered, for safety purposes. The bill would authorize appropriation of such sums as may be necessary. As drafted, the bill provides that the costs of modifying the dams shall be allocated among the authorized purposes served by the dams and reservoirs in accordance with standard cost allocation procedures. Costs allocated to irrigation shall be reimbursable only to the extent of the water users' ability to repay as determined by the Secretary. This is based on the premise, stated in section 2 of the bill, that the modifications are for safety purposes only, and not for providing any additional benefits over and above those originally authorized and provided by the original dams and reservoirs.

Proposals for modification shall appear as line items for budget review. They shall be based upon such assessment, as necessary, of the relative costs of the modification as compared to the costs and benefits of other measures which may be taken to achieve the same safety objective, such as modified operating procedures, phasing out the use of a project facility, or replacement of a project facility.

The bill is consistent with our desire for an active dam safety program within the Department and we strongly recommend that the bill be expeditiously approved by the Congress.

The Office of Management and Budget has advised that the enactment of this draft bill would be in accord with the program of the President.

Sincerely,

CECIL D. ANDRUS,
Secretary.

DEERFIELD DAM

Deerfield Dam, a feature of the Rapid Valley Project, South Dakota, was completed in 1947 It is located in Castle Creek, approximately 27 miles west of Rapid City. The dam is a 133-foot-high zoned earthfill structure. The dam crest is 35 feet wide and 825 feet long An uncontrolled, concrete, side-channel-type spillway is located at the right abutment of the dam. The reservoir capacity is 16,000 acre-feet when the water level is at the spillway crest. Deerfield Dam was constructed to supply water to approximately 8,900 acres of supplemental-service land

If the maximum probable flood were to occur, the capacity of the spillway and outlet works would be exceeded, and approximately 23,000 cubic feet per second would flow over the dam crest. Rapid erosion of the earth embankment would result, and the peak flow below the dam would probably exceed 700,00 cubic feet per second.

The seismic analysis of Deerfield Dam indicates that the dam is capable of withstanding safely the maximum credible earthquake event.

The proposed corrective action includes raising the dam 16 feet and modifying the spillway. The estimated cost of the work is $1,092,000 (based on January 1977 price level.)

Deerfield Reservoir and the downstream Pactola Reservoir are operated on a pooled storage basis. Deerfield Reservoir is filled each spring. The water elevation is held high during the summer months for recreation and is drawn down following the irrigation and recreation season. The evacuated reservoir space is reserved for winter inflow to prevent use of the outlet works and spillway during the coldest winter months.

LAHONTAN DAM

Lahontan Dam, a feature of Newlands Project, Nevada, was completed in 1915. It is located on the Carson River, 18 miles west of Fallon, Nevada. The dam is a 162-foot-high zoned earthfill structure; the crest is 20 feet wide and 5,400 feet long. The active storage capacity of 295,000 acre-feet when the water level in the reservoir is at the spillway crest can be increased to approximately 314,000 acre-feet by the installation of flashboards across the two spillways. The project is designed to irrigate approximately 73,000 acres of full-service land, including approximately 4,900 acres of Indian land.

Lahontan Dam is incapable of storing or safely passing the maximum probable flood. Flows from such a flood would damage the already deteriorated concrete in the spillway chutes, cause the right abutment of the dam to slough, and ultimately, failure of the dam. The resulting breach in the dam would permit an uncontrolled peak discharge of approximately 275,000 cubic feet per second.

The maximum credible earthquake event would cause substantial damage to Lahontan Dam but would not cause it to fail.

Corrective action includes the rehabilitation of the spillways and the outlet works and the construction of a concrete curtain wall in the dam crest. The estimated cost is $5,070,000 (based on January 1977 price level).

Until the corrective work can be accomplished, the amount of storage during the snowmelt runoff season has been restricted.

HYRUM DAM

Hyrum Dam, a feature of the Hyrum Project, Utah, was completed in 1935. It is located on Little Bear River at the southwest corner of the town of Hyrum, about 10 miles south of Logan, Utah. The dam is a 116-foot-high rolled earthfill structure; the crest is 35 feet wide and 540 feet long. The active storage capacity of the reservoir is approximately 15,000 acre-feet. Hyrum Project contains approximately 6,800 acres of supplemental-service land.

Porous material was used to construct the top 5 feet of the dam. Even if the reservoir were empty at the start of the maximum probable flood, the water level in the reservoir would rise sufficiently to permit the water to saturate and flow through the porous material. The flowing water would cause rapid breaching of the embankment and, ultimately, failure of the dam.

The seismic analysis of the dam has not been completed.

The proposed corrective action includes the construction of an auxiliary spillway at an estimated cost of $180,000 (based on January 1977 price level).

Until the corrective action is completed, the spillway gates are kept completely open throughout the winter months, until runoff forecasts indicate that low frequency, high-volume snowmelt runoff is not likely to occur.

STONY GORGE DAM

Stony Gorge Dam, a feature of the Orland Project, California, was completed in 1928. It is located on Stony Creek, approximately 40 miles southwest of Orland. The dam is a 139-foot-high concrete slab and buttress structure. The dam crest is 9.75 feet wide and 868 feet long Flow in the spillway at the center of the dam is controlled by three crawler gates. The active storage in the reservoir is approximately 50,000 acre-feet. The Orland Project contains approximately 19,600 acres of full-service land.

If the maximum probable flood were to occur, the capacity of the spillway and outlet works would be exceeded and the water level in the reservoir would rise 4 or 5 feet higher than the crest. Overtopping the dam would result in the undermining of the buttresses and cause failure of the dam.

The seismic analysis of Stony Gorge Dam indicates that no appreciable damage would result from the occurrence of the maximum credible earthquake event.

The proposed corrective action includes the construction of an additional spillway and would cost an estimated 2,600,000 (based on January 1977 price level).

Because Stony Gorge Dam can store or safely pass intermediate size floods safely, no interim operating procedures have been implemented.

GIBSON DAM

Gibson Dam, a feature of the Sun River Project, Montana, was completed in 1927. It is located on the north fork of Sun River, 70 miles west of Great Falls. The dam is a 199-foot-high concrete arch structure. The 960-foot-long crest is 15 feet wide. A drop-inlet spillway is located near the left abutment. The atcive reservoir capacity is 105,000 acre-feet. The Sun River Project contains approximately 91,000 acres of full-service irrigable land.

If the maximum probable flood were to occur, the capacity of the spillway and outlet works would be exceeded, and the water level in the reservoir would rise 11 feet above the dam crest. Although the overflow would not cause the dam to fail, it would erode the abutments and weaken the dam.

The seismic analysis indicates that the dam would not fail during the occurrence of the maximum earthquake event and that damage resulting from the event would not be major.

The proposed corrective action includes the installation of aeration piers and protection of the left and right abutments by the installation of rockbolts. The estimated cost is $962,000 (based on January 1977 price level).

To protect the dam from being overtopped by floods of less than a 100-year frequency, the reservoir storage is restricted until the snowmelt runoff recedes to less than 6,000 cubic feet per second.

BLACK CANYON DAM

Black Canyon Dam, a feature of the Payette Division, Boise Project, Idaho, was completed in 1924. It is located on Payette River, 5 miles northeast of Emmett, Idaho. The dam is a concrete gravity structure with a gated ogee spillway. The dam crest is 1,039 feet long. A power-pumping plant is located at the north end of the dam. The dam serves to divert water into the Black Canyon Canal. The Payette Division contains approximately 60,000 acres of full-service land and approximately 54,000 acres of supplemental-service land.

If the maximum probable flood were to occur, the dam would be overtopped by more than 3 feet, and the power-pumping plant building and penstocks, the utility building, the switchyard, and the new control building would be extensively damaged. No lives would be endangered.

There is some concern about the capability of the dam to withstand the maximum credible earthquake event, and seismic studies have been initiated.

The proposed corrective action includes the construction of an auxiliary spillway. The estimated cost is $3,250,000 (based on January 1977 price level). The results of the seismic studies may indicate that additional corrective action is required.

Because Black Canyon Dam is a diversion dam and the reservoir contains only limited storage, a change in operation would not eliminate the need for corrective action.

ALTUS DAM

Altus Dam and related earth dikes, features of the W. C. Austin Project, Oklahoma, were completed in 1945. The dam is located on the north fork of Red River, approximately 18 miles north of Altus, Oklahoma. The 110-foot-high concrete gravity dam is faced with granite masonry on both faces except for the downstream face of the overflow section. The crest is 10 feet wide and 1,112 feet long. The active storage capacity of the reservoir is 154,000 acre-feet. The W. C. Austin Project furnishes water to approximately 47,000 acres of full-service land.

If the maximum probable flood were to occur, the water level in the reservoir would rise approximately 12 feet above the crest of the dam, assuming that the existing dikes did not fail.

The seismic analysis indicates that the dam and dikes would withstand safely the occurrence of the maximum credible earthquake.

The proposed corrective action includes the lowering of the north dike, raising other dikes, and constructing one new dike. The estimated cost is $858,000 (based on January 1977 price level).

To reduce the probability of serious freeboard encroachment at Altus Dam prior to the completion of corrective action, special arrangements for the receipt of precipitation and streamflow data have been made with the Weather Service and with the Corps of Engineers. We are cooperating with the Corps in revising flood-control regulations for Altus Dam.

THEODORE ROOSEVELT DAM

Theodore Roosevelt Dam, a feature of the Salt River Project, Arizona, was completed in 1911. The dam is located on the Salt River, approximately 30 miles northwest of Globe. The 280-foot-high rubble-masonry, thick-arch structure has two overfall spillways. Flows in the spillways are controlled by radial gates. The dam crest is 16 feet wide and 723 feet long. The active storage capacity of the reservoir is approximately 1,382,000 acre-feet. A powerplant is located at the base of the left abutment. The Salt River Project contains approximately 263,000 acres of irrigable land, of which 238,000 acres are full-service land.

If the maximum probable flood were to occur, the water in the reservoir would rise approximately 2.5 feet above the top of the dam parapet and the dam would fail.

The seismic analysis indicates that the dam is capable of withstanding the maximum credible earthquake event safely.

The corrective action being considered at the present time includes raising the dam and modifying the spillway at an estimated cost of $1,209,000 (based on January 1977 price level).

Under present operating restrictions, the normal water level in the reservoir has been reduced to protect against failure during intermediate floods.

STEWART MOUNTAIN DAM

Stewart Mountain Dam, a feature of the Salt River Project, Arizona, was completed in 1930 and modified by the Bureau of Reclamation in 1936. It is located on the Salt River, approximately 41 miles northeast of Phoenix, Arizona. The dam, a thin-arch, concrete structure, has a concrete weir spillway at the left abutment. The dam crest is 8 feet wide and 1,260 feet long. The active capacity of the reservoir is approximately 70,000 acre-feet. A powerplant is located at the base of the right abutment. The Salt River Project contains approximately 263,000 acres of irrigable land, of which approximately 238,000 acres are full-service land.

In the event the maximum probable flood were to occur, Stewart Mountain Dam would not fail; the undermining effect of the high-velocity flows in the spillway, however, would cause severe damage to the right wall and floor slab of the spillway chute.

A seismic analysis of Stewart Mountain Dam indicates that the dam could withstand the maximum credible earthquake event safely.

The proposed corrective action includes raising the dam and modifying the spillway at a cost of $6,760,000 (based on January 1977 price level).

To minimize damage to the spillway, discharges through the spillway should be restricted to 105,000 cubic feet per second (approximately two-thirds of its capacity) until the corrective work has been completed.

JACKSON LAKE DAM

Jackson Lake Dam, a feature of the Minidoka Project, Idaho-Wyoming, was completed in 1911 and was enlarged in 1916. It is located on the Snake River, near Moran, Wyoming. The 78-foot-high dam is a concrete gravity structure with earth embankment wings. The crest is 20 feet wide and 4,920 feet long. The active capacity of the reservoir is approximately 847,000 acre-feet. The concrete overflow spillway is controlled by radial gates. Jackson Lake Dam is one of five Minidoka Project dams. The project contains approximately 1,163,000 acres of irrigable land, of which 217,000 acres are full-service land.

Jackson Lake Dam is capable of withstanding the maximum probable flood.

The seismic studies are incomplete, however, the indications are that the earth embankments may require stabilization to enable them to withstand the maximum credible earhquake event. The concrete section of the dam has been stabilized and is capable of withstanding that event.

The amount of corrective action needed to make the earth embankment safe will be determined when the current seismic studies have been completed. At this time, the estimated cost of the work needed to stabilize the embankments is $4 million (based on January 1977 price level).

Interim operating procedures are not required at Jackson Lake Dam.

ISLAND PARK DAM

Island Park Dam, a feature of the Upper Snake River Storage Division, Minidoka Project, Idaho, was completed in 1938. The dam is located on Henrys Fork, approximately 38 miles north of Ashton, Idaho. The 91-foot-high zoned earthfill structure has a U-shaped concrete weir spillway located at the right abutment. The dam crest is 35 feet wide and 9,448 feet long. The active capacity of the reservoir is approximately 128,000 acre-feet. The Upper Snake River Storage Division contains approximately 112,000 acres of supplemental-service land.

The concrete in the Island Park Dam spillway is in an advanced stage of deterioration. Studies have indicated that the dam is incapable of storing or passing safely the maximum probable flood.

The proposed corrective action includes the modification of the spillway and outlet works of the dam, at an estimated cost of $2,405,000 (based on January 1977 price level).

The material in the upper portion of the embankment is not watertight, and the operating procedures have been revised to limit the amount of storage in the reservoir during periods when the maximum probable flood could occur.

WILLOW CREEK DAM

Willow Creek Dam, a feature of the Fort Shaw Division, Sun River Project, Montana, was completed in 1911. The dam is located on Willow Creek approximately 5 miles northwest of Augusta, Montana. The 93-foot-high modified homogeneous earthfill structure has an uncontrolled open channel emergency spillway in dike No. 5, approximately 3,600 feet north of the dam. The crest of the dam is 30 feet wide and 650 feet long. The active reservoir capacity is approximately 32,000 acre-feet. The Fort Shaw Division contains approximately 10,000 acres of full-service land.

A geological investigation revealed that the top 7 or 8 feet of the unlined spillway channel are highly erodible. If the maximum probable flood were to occur, the spillway would fail and a substantial loss of reservoir storage would occur.

The seismic analysis indicates that Willow Creek Dam is capable of withstanding the maximum credible earthquake event.

The proposed corrective action includes raising the dam and the construction of a replacement spillway. The estimated cost of the work is $3,640,000 (based on January 1977 price level).

There are no operating restrictions at Willow Creek Dam.

EAST PARK DAM

East Park Dam, a feature of the Orland Project, California, was completed in 1914. The outlet works were modified in 1916. The dam is located on the Little Stony Creek, approximately 31 miles southwest of Orland, California. The 139-foot-high concrete thick-arch dam has a concrete multiple-arch uncontrolled overflow spillway approximately 2,000 feet south of the dam. The crest of the dam is 10 feet wide and 266 feet long. The active storage capacity of the reservoir is approximately 51,000 acre-feet. The Orland Project contains approximately 19,600 acres of full-service land.

If the maximum probable flood were to occur at East Park Dam, the water surface in the reservoir would rise approximately 4 feet higher than the dam. The event would cause failure of the spillway structure and probably one or both dikes and the small retaining wall south of the dam.

Results of the seismic analysis indicate that the dam would suffer damage during the occurrence of the maximum credible earthquake event; although the dam would not fail, the stability of the spillway structure is marginal, and it would probably fail.

The proposed corrective action includes the construction of a larger spillway, at an estimated cost of $3,900,000 (based on January 1977 price level).

There are no operating restrictions at East Park Dam.●

S. 2821. A bill to authorize $8,868,000 for grants to the government of Guam for construction of public facilities, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

● Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, by request, I send to the desk for appropriate reference a bill to authorize $8,868,000 for grants to the government of Guam for construction of public facilities, and for other purposes.

Mr. President, this draft legislation was submitted and recommended by the Department of the Interior, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill and the executive communication accompanying the proposal from the Under Secretary of the Interior be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill and letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of the Interior (hereinafter referred to as the Secretary), an amount not to exceed $8,868,000 for a grant to the government of Guam to assist in the rehabilitation, upgrading and construction of public facilities.

SEC. 2. Funds provided under this Act may be used as the matching share for Federal programs and services.

SEC. 3. The government of Guam in carrying out the purpose of this Act may utilize, to the extent practicable, the available services and facilities of agencies and instrumentalities of the Federal Government or a reimbursable basis. Reimbursements may be credited to the appropriation or fund which provided the services and facilities. Agencies and instrumentalities of the Federal Government may, when practicable, make available to the government of Guam upon request of the Secretary such services and facilities as they are equipped to render or furnish, and they may do so without reimbursement if otherwise authorized by law.

SEC. 4. Funds appropriated pursuant to this Act shall remain available until expended, and the Secretary may place such stipulations as he deems appropriate on the use of these funds.

SEC. 5. No request by the Governor of Guam for the payment of funds pursuant to this Act will be accepted unless the territorial legislature has concurred in the Governor's request.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D.C., February 6, 1978.

Hon. WALTER F. MONDALE,
President, United States Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: There is enclosed a draft bill "To authorize $8,868,000 for grants to the Government of Guam for construction of Public facilities, and for other purposes.".

We recommend that the bill be referred to the appropriate Committee for consideration, and that it be enacted.

The draft bill would authorize the appropriation of $8,868,000 to the Secretary of the Interior for a grant to the Government of Guam for the purpose of rehabilitation and upgrading existing public facilities and constructing new facilities. Many of Guam's public facilities were severely damaged or destroyed by Typhoon Pamela which devastated Guam in May 1976. In addition, many of the territory's public facilities were constructed by the United States military after World War II and are no longer adequate to met the needs of Guam's growing civilian population.

For fiscal year 1977, this Department received a $500,000 supplemental appropriation which is being used to develop a program plan to help the Government of Guam deal with its short and long range needs. The plan will cover a broad range of activities, including governmental operations, financial management, economic development, and alternative proposals for Federal Government assistance.

However, until the program plan is completed and final recommendations and alternatives have been evaluated, this proposed $8,868,000 construction grant will provide for the improvement of the territory's water system which the government of Guam has identified as the highest priority for capital improvements. The requested funds will permit Guam to start on some of the more immediate projects thus providing some immediate assistance to Guam until the overall assessment plan is completed and a more comprehensive program for the territory can be developed.

Local revenues are forecasted to be deficient over the insuing period and thus will provide for only the basic operating programs of the Government of Guam. This then leaves no funding to provide for priority capital improvement needs.

Since Typhoon Pamela, this Department has assisted the Guam Government in obtaining direct Federal financial assistance of $45.2 million for the rebuilding of the island. This assistance consisted of a $20.0 million emergency grant following the typhoon to maintain essential government services; a $10.2 million grant to reconstruct and upgrade power and water facilities damaged by the typhoon; and a $15.0 million grant to supplement Guam's reduced revenues.

In addition, approximately $64 million in grants and loans has been received by Guam from other Federal agencies, such as the Department of Health, Education and Welfare and the Federal Disaster Assistance Administration as a result o fthe damage created by the typhoon. The grants for which this authorization is being requested will allow Guam to continue on its program of typhoon rehabilitation and general infra-structure improvement and development.

The Office of Management and Budget has advised that the enactment of this legislation would be in accord with the program of the President.

Sincerely,

JAMES A. JOSEPH,
Under Secretary.●

S. 2822. A bill to authorize the appropriation of funds for the rehabilitation and resettlement of Bikini Atoll, Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Energy and Natural Resources.

● Mr. JACKSON. Mr. President, by request, I send to the desk for appropriate reference a bill to authorize the appropriation of funds for the rehabilitation and resettlement of Bikini Atoll, Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, and for other purposes.

Mr. President, this draft legislation was submitted and recommended by the Department of the Interior, and I ask unanimous consent that the bill and the executive communication accompanying the proposal from the Under Secretary of the Interior be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill and letter were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That there are hereby authorized to be appropriated not more than $15 million (December 1977 prices) plus or minus such amount, if any, as may be justified by reason of ordinary fluctuations in construction costs as indicated by engineering cost indices applicable to the types of construction involved, for rehabilitation and resettlement of Bikini Atoll.

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, D.C., February 6, 1978.

Hon. WALTER F. MONDALE,
President, U.S. Senate,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: There is enclosed a proposed bill "To authorize the appropriation of funds for the rehabilitation and resettlement of Bikini Atoll, Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands, and for other purposes.".

Bikini Atoll lies among the Marshall Islands, which are a part of the Trust Territory of the Pacific Islands administered by the United States pursuant to an agreement with the Security Council of the United Nations. The United States carried on atomic testing there between 1948 and 1958 which severely damaged Bikini Atoll and rendered much of it uninhabitable.

The United States has committed itself to returning the atoll to its original owners when security purposes no longer required its use for testing or defense purposes, and from 1958 onward the people of Bikini increasingly pressed for a return. Between 1966 and 1967, the former Atomic Energy Commission conducted several radiological surveys, and reported that after cleanup, a certain number of the islands of the atoll were safe for civilian habitation. Accordingly, on August 12, 1968, President Johnson announced that Bikini Atoll was no longer required for the nuclear testing program or for defense purposes, and that the atoll would be returned to the people of Bikini following cleanup and rehabilitation.

In June 1975 an intensive ground radiological survey was conducted by Energy Research Development Administration (ERDA) and it revealed that the original recommendations concerning resettlement on Bikini Island needed major revision. It became evident that radionuclide intake in the plant food chain had been significantly miscalculated in terms of human consumption. The results of the 1975 ERDA survey led to the decision that an aerial radiological survey be done for Bikini Atoll also. This kind of aerial survey can reveal residual results not available from ground techniques, particularly the presence of plutonium in the soil. The aerial radiological survey is expected to be carried out in early 1978, and results for Bikini Atoll will be available shortly thereafter.

The 1975 ERDA radiological survey demonstrated conclusively that the interior of Bikini Island should not be used for residential purposes; that well water should not be used for human consumption; and that locally grown food products must be placed on a restricted basis as far as consumption by the people is concerned. By late 1976, it was evident that coconut trees, formerly not expected to pose a recycling danger, were also suspected. The restriction on the use of coconut products produced on Bikini Island for food and export additionally make the island of Bikini unrealistic as a permanent place of settlement and for agricultural use.

It is now clear that the use of Bikini Island (the largest island on the Atoll) cannot be considered at the present time as the site for permanent resettlement for the approximately 500 Bikinians who seek to return, or for immediate agricultural purposes. In short, a complete recasting of the Bikini Resettlement Program is required.

A Master Plan for Bikini Resettlement, completed in 1974, revised the original 1969 plans for development of the atoll. This 1974 Master Plan envisioned using both Bikini Island and Eneu Island for habitation and for agricultural purposes.

Since action on the Bikini resettlement problem is urgently needed, a number of alternative plans currently are being considered. The most feasible, at present, appears to be to concentrate the major resettlement project on Eneu Island. This Island, which lies approximately 12 miles south of Bikini Island, did not, in contrast with Bikini, receive significant amounts of radiation fallout, and radiation exposure of people living there would meet U.S. Federal safety standards. A preliminary recasting of the 1974 Bikini Master Plan indicated that approximately $13 million will be required to rehabilitate Eneu Island and to develop suitable residential community facilities there. 21,000 coconut trees already have been planted on Eneu Island and are bearing. Analysis reveals that these Eneu Island coconuts can be used for food and possible future copra export. Additionally, there are smaller islands available which must be planted with coconut groves and other food crops to replace the coconut groves and garden plots on Bikini Island which, for the foreseeable future, will continue to be restricted as to use.

Experimental garden plots for vegetables, breadfruit, and other crops have been established on Eneu Island and are flourishing. Analytic test results of these garden crops will be available by early summer, 1978. Since coconuts on Eneu Island already have been tested and are safe, it is expected, in view of the vastly lower radioactivity level of the Eneu soil, that other food crops also will be useable.

The restrictions on the use of Bikini Island, however, do pose the question as to whether all of the approximately 500 Bikinians who have indicated a strong desire to return to Bikini Atoll, can be adequately accommodated on Eneu Island. Even if they can it is anticipated that a small group of Bikinians will elect to remain on Kili Island. Estimates for rehabilitation of the Kili Island community facilities are set at a minimum of $2,000,000, thus making the overall Bikini rehabilitation project estimate $15 million at 1977 prices.

The Office of Management and Budget has advised that enactment of this legislation would be consistent with the Administration's objectives.

Sincerely,

JAMES A. JOSEPH,
Under Secretary.●

(b) Section 415 is amended by adding the following new subsections:

"(f)(1) The remedy—

"(A) against the United States provided by sections 1346(b) and 2672 of title 28, or (B) through proceedings for compensation or other benefits from the United States as provided by any other law, where the availability of such benefits precludes a remedy under section 1346(b) or 2672 of title 28, for damages for personal injury, including death, allegedly arising from malpractice or negligence of a physician, dentists, podiatrist, optometrist, nurse, physician assistant, expanded-function dental auxiliary, pharmacist, or paramedical (for example, medical and dental technicians, nursing assistants, and therapists) or other supporting personnal in furnishing medical care or treatment while in the exercise of such person's duties as a full-time volunteer under title I of the Act shall hereafter be exclusive of any other civil action or proceeding by reason of the same subject matter against such physician, dentist, podiatrist, optometrist, nurse, physician assistant, expanded-function dental auxiliary, phramacist or paramedical or other supporting personnel (or such person's estate) whose action or omission gave rise to such claim.

"(2) The Attorney General shall defend any civil action or proceeding brought in any court against any person referred to in paragraph (1) of this subsection (or such person's estate) for any such damage or injury. Any such persons against whom such civil action or proceeding is brought shall deliver within such time after date of service or knowledge of service as determined by the Attorney General, all process served upon such person or an attested true copy thereof to such person's immediate supervisor or to whomever was designated by the Director to receive such papers and such person shall promptly furnish copies of the pleading and process therein to the United States attorney for the district embracing the place wherein the proceeding is brought and to the Attorney General.

"(3) Upon a certification by the Attorney General that the defendant was acting in the scope of such person's volunteer assignment at the time of the incident out of which the suit arose, any such civil action or proceeding commenced in a State court shall be removed without bond at any time before trial by the Attorney General to the district court of the United States of the district and division embracing the place wherein it is pending and the proceeding deemed a tort action brought against the United States under the provisions of title 28 and all references thereto. After removal the United States shall have available all defenses to which it would have been entitled if the action had originally been commenced against the United States. Should a United States district court determine on a hearing on a motion to remand held before a trial on the merits that the volunteer whose act or omission gave rise to the suit was not acting within the scope of such person's volunteer assignment, the case shall be remanded to the State Court.

"(4) The Attorney General may compromise or settle any claim asserted in such civil action or proceeding in the manner provided in section 2677 of title 28, and with the same effect.

"(g) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, a full-time volunteer under title I of this Act who is otherwise entitled to receive assistance or services under any governmental program shall not be denied such assistance or services because of such volunteer's failure or refusal to register for, seek, or accept employment."

SEC. 11. Section 417 is amended:

(a) by adding at the end of subsection (a) the following new sentence:

"For the purposes of this section, and Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, programs or activities receiving the services of volunteers shall be deemed to be receiving Federal financial assistance."; and

(b) by adding the following new subsection at the end thereof;

"(c)(1) All personnel actions by the ACTION agency affecting individuals enrolled as full-time volunteers or part-time volunteers enrolled for periods of service of at least 20 hours per week, or applicants for such enrollment, shall be made free from any discrimination based on race, color, religion, sex, or national origin.

"(2) The Director shall have authority to provide appropriate remedies to effectuate the policies of paragraph (1), including reinstatement or enrollment of volunteers with or without back allowances, benefits and stipends, and shall issue such rules, regulations, orders and instructions as he deems necessary and appropriate to carry out his responsibilities under this subsection, which shall include a requirement that a volunteer or volunteer applicant shall be notified of any final action taken on any complaint of discrimination filed by him thereunder.

"(3) Within thirty days of receipt of notice of final action referred to in paragraph (2), or after one hundred and eighty days from the filing of the initial complaint with the ACTION Agency until such time as final action is taken by the ACTION Agency, a volunteer or volunteer applicant, if aggrieved by the final action taken, or by the failure to take final action on such complaint, may file a civil action as provided in section 706 of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, as amended, and the provisions of section 706(f) through (k) of such Act shall govern civil actions brought hereunder."

SEC. 12. (a) Section 501 of the Act is amended (1) by striking out, in subsection (a), everything after the word "appropriated" and by inserting in lieu thereof "such sums as may be necessary for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1978, $48,239,000 for fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, and such sums as may be necessary for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1980, for the purpose of carrying out programs under title I of this Act.", and (2) by striking out all of subsection (b).

(b) The Act is amended by striking out section 502 and by inserting in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 502. There are authorized to be appropriated $57,940,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, and such sums as may be necessary for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1980 for the purpose of carrying out programs under title II of this Act."

(c) Section 504 is amended by striking out "and" after "September 30, 1977," and by adding "September 30, 1979, and September 30, 1980," after "September 30, 1978,".

Section 13. P.L. 94–130, 89 Stat. 684, is amended by striking out the second sentence of section 5(b) thereof.

ACTION,
Washington, D.C., March 20, 1978.

Hon. WALTER F. MONDALE,
President of the United States Senate, U.S. Senate, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: Enclosed for your consideration is draft legislation which will enable ACTION to continue its work in providing volunteers to programs which seek to alleviate poverty and poverty-related human, social and environmental problems within the United States.

The proposed bill authorizes the appropriation of $48,239,000 for programs under Title I of the Domestic Volunteer Service Act of 1973 for fiscal year 1979, and such sums as may be necessary for these programs for fiscal year 1980. Programs authorized by Title I of the Act include VISTA, University Year for ACTION, the National Student Volunteer Program, the Youth Challenge Program, Mini-Grants, assistance to state volunteer organizations, and technical assistance to volunteer agencies. Since ACTION's budget does not include funds for the University Year for ACTION program for fiscal year 1979, the authorization requested does not include funds for that program.

The bill would also authorize the appropriation of $57,940,000 for Older American Volunteer Programs for 1979, and such sums as may be necessary for these programs for 1980.

priation of such sums as may be necessary for the administration of programs under the Domestic Volunteer Service Act for fiscal years 1979 and 1980.

There are, in the bill, a number of new proposals to broaden the authority of the Director to operate a full range of volunteer programs and to provide effective support to volunteers serving in the agency's programs. These include a provision which will permit the Director to determine what types of allowances, stipends and support should be provided to persons serving in Special Volunteer programs under Part C of Title I of the Act. Under the proposed amendment, the Director could provide volunteers in these programs with appropriate allowances.

Other provisions which will provide more effective support to volunteers include a proposal that section 415(b) of the Domestic Volunteer Service Act be amended to include all full-time volunteers, and part-time volunters serving at least 20 hours in programs authorized by Title I of the Act to the extent that the Director deems appropriate. Coverage of volunteers for Federal Tort Claims Act and Federal Employees' Compensation Act purposes, which are among the benefits contained in this section, is essential to the performance of the volunteers' duties. They are presently available only to volunteers enrolled for periods of service of at least one year.

The bill also adds a new provision permitting the government to waive collection of erroneous payments of volunteer allowances where collection would be against good conscience and not to the advantage of the government. This authority is presently available with respect to federal employees, and has been extended to Peace Corps volunteers. Enactment of this provision would prevent hardship to volunteers who receive small overpayments of allowances and stipends which they are unable to repay because their allowances are only sufficient to permit them to live at the level of the poor people whom they serve.

The bill contains a provision which would extend to full-time volunteers under Title I of the Act the same type of medical malpractice coverage under the Federal Tort Claims Act as is now available to medical personnel serving in the Public Health Service, with the Veterans Administration, under the Foreign Service Act, and with various military services. This coverage would make the Federal Tort Claims Act the sole remedy for damages for personal injury or death resulting from malpractice arising out of performance of the volunteer's duty.

The Solicitor of Labor has recently ruled that volunteers who are receiving Aid to Families with Dependent Children are required to enroll in the Work Incentive program (WIN). WIN requires that, to be eligible for benefits (and, under recent legislation, food stamps), recipients are required to register for, seek, and accept employment. Under the Domestic Volunteer Service Act, low-income locally recruited volunteers who were receiving AFDC benefits prior to their enrollment in ACTION volunteer programs are entitled to exclude their volunteer allowances and stipends in computing their eligibility for public assistance. This provision is intended to permit low-income persons with dependents to serve as volunteers, while continuing to receive the public assistance necessary to support their dependents.

These volunteers' assignments are based on the expectation that they will be able to complete their full year of service. If however, they were required, while serving as volunteers, to actively seek employment, the provisions of the Domestic Volunteer Service Act which encourage the enrollment of low-income volunteers would be defeated. We are proposing that such volunteers be exempted from the requirement that they register for and seek employment as a precondition to receiving the public assistance to which they would otherwise be entitled.

Finally, the proposed bill would strengthen the antidiscrimination provisions of the Domestic Volunteer Service Act by making it clear that volunteer service is Federal financial assistance for the purposes of Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, and by specifically prohibiting discrimination in personnel actions involving volunteers and volunteer applicants.

Several provisions relating to the management of Older American Volunteer programs are included in the bill. The bill amends section 201 of the Domestic Volunteer Service Act to reduce the time State Agencies on Aging have to make recommendations on RSVP project applications from 60 to 30 days and to make clear that Retired Senior Volunteer Program participants are not employees of ACTION or of sponsors for any purpose. These volunteers, who are all over 60 years of age, receive no compensation for their services, and are reimbursed only for certain types of out-of-pocket expenses.

Certain State Workers Compensation Agencies are contending that RSVP volunteers should be covered by worker's compensation. ACTION makes low cost accident insurance for volunteers available to sponsors, except for certain public agencies which are self-insurers in this regard, to cover the medical cost of any injury suffered by the volunteers. The contention that these older volunteers are employees for the purpose of worker's compensation is inconsistent with the volunteer nature of the RSVP program, and because of the large number of volunteers involved, could lead to substantial and unwarranted expense.

The proposed legislation also would replace the provision which requires that State Agencies on Aging and Community Action Agencies be given the right to apply for and become sponsors of Foster Grandparent and Senior Companion Programs on a preferential basis with a provision which would give these agencies notice and an opportunity to comment on project proposals. The new provision is similar to that which is applicable to the Retired Senior Volunteer Program. This new provision will permit ACTION to follow a consistent policy of coordinating its programs for Older American volunteers with state agencies on aging and community action agencies.

Several provisions of the bill are aimed at improving the management capabilities of the agency. It would delete the mandatory titles which the Act now requires be assigned to Associate Directors for Domestic and International Operations. These Presidentially appointed officers would continue to be designated Associate Directors. However, the title "Associate Director for International Operations" does not adequately reflect the duties of the Associate Director responsible for activities under the Peace Corps Act, and should not be required to be used.

The bill eliminates a number of constraints presently found in the Domestic Volunteer Service Act which inhibit the ageny's ability to manage appropriated funds in the most efficient manner. These include a requirement that at least $29,600,000 of the funds appropriated for programs under Title I of the Act be expended for poverty-related programs, and that, of this amount, at least $22,300,000 must be apportioned to VISTA. Since the agency budget request for these purposes far exceeds these limits, they have become essentially meaningless.

The proposed bill would also strike out the current limitation, contained in section 108 of the Domestic Volunteer Service Act, on the portion of VISTA appropriations that can be used for grants and cost shared programs. These program mechanisms have now proved themselves and the limitation initially placed on their use is no longer necessary.

The bill also strikes out a limitation in the Act which prohibits the expenditure of more than 10 percent of the first $6,700,000 of the appropriation for Service Learning Programs under Part B of Title I of the Act for programs other than the University for Action Program. This provision penalizes other service learning programs if less than $6,030,000 is expended on the UYA program. In view of ACTION's decision not to continue the support of existing University Year for ACTION grants in fiscal year 1979, it is necessary that this limitation be removed so that ACTION's other service learning program—the National Student Volunteer Program, which will be modified to include the Youth Challenge Program, can continue to operate.

The Office of Management and Budget has advised that there is no objection to the submission of this draft legislation to the Congress and that its enactment would be in accord with the program of the President.

Sincerely,

SAM BROWN,
Director.

SECTION-BY-SECTION ANALYSIS

AMENDMENTS AFFECTING PROGRAMS UNDER THE DOMESTIC VOLUNTEER SERVICE ACT OF 1973

Section 1, the enacting clause, contains the short title of the Act, the "Domestic Volunteer Service Act Amendments of 1978."

Section 2, authorizes the Director to determine the circumstances in which VISTA volunteer stipends can be advanced to volunteers. The amended provision will be identical to the provision of the Peace Corps Act applicable to Peace Corps volunteers. At present, VISTA volunteer stipends can be advanced to volunteers only in "extraordinary circumstances." One present difference which would be eliminated is that Peace Corps volunteers may invest their accrued readjustment allowances in savings bonds, while VISTA's may not.

Section 3 strikes out section 108 of the Act, which limits the proportion of the VISTA appropriation that can be used for grants and cost-shared programs to 20%. This limitation places an unnecessary constraint on the method by which VISTA programs are managed.

Section 4 strikes out those parts of Section 114(a) of the Act which prohibit the expenditure of more than 10% of the first $6,700,000 of the appropriation for service-learning programs for programs other than the University Year for ACTION (UYA) program. This provision penalizes other service learning programs if less than $6,030,000 is expended on the UYA program. The requested change is necessary to permit the ACTION agency to carry out the proposal, contained in its fiscal year 1979 budget, to discontinue funding of the UYA program, and to slightly increase funding for a combined National Student Volunteer Program and Youth Challenge Program.

Section 5 amends Section 122(c) of the Act to provide the Director with greater authority to determine what types of allowances, stipends and support should be paid to persons serving as volunteers under Part C of Title I of the Act. At present, allowances and stipends may be paid only to volunteers serving full-time in programs of at least one year's duration. This makes it impossible for the agency to offer a full range of volunteer programs. Full-time short-term volunteers, such as those who might be mobilized to assist at the scene of a natural disaster, cannot now be paid either allowances or stipends. Volunteers who work a substantial number of hours, but less than full time, cannot be paid either allowances or stipends. An example of the type of program which would fall into this category is the displaced homemaker program, in which women making a transition to full-time employment might volunteer for twenty hours a week.

The amended section will authorize the Director of ACTION to provide volunteers such allowances, stipends and other support as he determines are necessary to carry out the . . . of Part C of Title I of the Act—that is, to enroll volunteers to meet a broadrange of human, social and environmental problems, especially those related to poverty. The Director, however, may not pay an end-of-service stipend to volunteers who serve less than 10 weeks or less than 20 hours a week.

Section 6 would amend section 201 of the Act by decreasing the time which is given to State Agencies on Aging to comment on proposed RSVP programs from sixty days to thirty and by adding a new subsection to make clear that Retired Senior Volunteers are not employees of either ACTION or the sponsoring agency for any purpose, including State Workers Compensation laws. Limiting the time permitted for comments on RSVP proposals to thirty days would substantially decrease the amount of time required to process proposals.

The provision declaring that RSVP volunteers are not employees is necessary because a few states have asserted that RSVP's are employees of program sponsors for workers' compensation purposes even though the volunteers receive no compensation for their volunteer activities. ACTION makes low-cost accident insurance coverage for volunteers available to sponsors, except public agencies which are self-insurers. The contention that these older volunteers are in fact employees for the purpose of workers' compensation is inconsistent with the volunteer nature of the program and, because of the large number of volunteers involved, could lead to substantial and unwarranted expense for projects. It is therefore necessary, in order to have a uniform solution to this problem throughout the country, to include in the legislation a declaration that volunteers are not employees for any purpose.

Section 7 amends section 212 to substitute a notice provision for the present preference given to State agencies on Aging and Community Action Agencies in the selection of sponsors for Foster Grandparent and Senior Companion Programs. This preference limits the agency's ability to select the best sponsor in each situation. The new provision, which will be the same as that proposed for the Retired Senior Volunteer Program, requires that 30 days notice of all proposed grant or contract awards for Foster Grandparent and Senior Companion programs conducted in an area greater than one community be given to State Agencies on Aging, unless that agency is the grantee, to permit the State Agency on Aging to review the application and make recommendations.

If the project is to be operated in a community entirely within the jurisdiction of a Community Action Agency, the Community Action Agency must be given a similar thirty day period to review the proposal, and make recommendations.

These new provisions replace requirements that the State Agency on Aging be given reasonable opportunity to apply for and receive an award of Foster Grandparent, and to administer or supervise the administration of the project. In cases in which the State Agency on Aging is not the grantee or contractor, the application is required to contain assurances that the project has been developed, and will to the extent appropriate be conducted in consultation with, or with the participation of such agency.

Community Action Agencies are covered by similar provisions with respect to projects entirely conducted within a single community.

Under the new provisions, State Agencies on Aging and Community Action Agencies would still be eligible to receive Foster Grandparent and Senior Companion grants. However, they would be considered on the same basis as other agencies. In recognition of the legitimate interest of these agencies in these types of programs, they would be given a thirty day period to review grant proposals and make recommendations.

Section 8 amends Section 401 of the Act to delete the mandatory titles which Section 401 now requires be assigned to the Associate Directors for domestic and international operations. Both would continue to be designated Associate Directors. However, the agency believes that the title "Associate Director for International Operations," in particular, does not adequately reflect the duties of the Associate Director responsible for activities under the Peace Corps Act, or give adequate recognition to the separate identity of the Peace Corps within the agency.

Section 9 amends section 402 of the Act to strike out the reference to section 108, which is repealed by section 3.

Section 10(a) amends section 415(b) of the Act in two respects:

(a) The restrictions and benefits of the section, which include the Hatch Act, federal employee status for income tax and social security purposes, and Federal Tort Claims and Federal Employee Compensation coverage, are extended to all full-time volunteers, and also to part-time volunteers serving at least 20 hours a week in Title I programs to the extent the Director deems appropriate. These coverages are now available only to full-time volunteers in Title I programs enrolled for at least one year. Lack of tort claims and workers compensation coverage has proved a major obstacle to the agency's efforts to offer short term service opportunities, and to enroll individuals in programs of part-time service where the individual contributes a substantial period of time (20 or more hours a week) to volunteer service. Full-time volunteers would continue to be deemed to receive compensation at the entry level of a GS–7 employee, but part-time volunteers serving at least 20 hours per week would be deemed to be receiving compensation at the entry level of a GS–2 employee. Part-time volunteers serving less than 20 hours per week are not covered by these provisions.

(b) The provisions of section 5584 of Title 5, United States Code, permitting the government to waive erroneous payments of pay to employees where collection would be against good conscience, and not to the advantage of the government, are made applicable to volunteer allowances and stipends paid under Title I of the Act. This coverage is presently available to Peace Corps volunteers, and would prevent hardship to volunteers who receive small overpayments of allowances and stipends which they find themselves unable to repay because their allowances are so small. In addition, the requirement that these erroneous payments be collected results, in many cases, in an expenditure of time by government employees in excess of the anticipated collection.

Section 10(b) adds two new subsections to section 415 of the Act. New subsection (f) would extend to full-time volunteers under Title I of the Act the same type of medical malpractice coverage under the Federal Tort Claims Act as is available to medical personnel serving in the Public Health Service, in the Veterans Administration, under the Foreign Service Act and with various military services. This coverage makes the Federal Tort Claims Act and the Federal Employees' Compensation Act the sole remedies for damages for personal injury or death resulting from malpractice arising out of the performance of a volunteer's duties. The coverage extends to all volunteers performing medically-related duties. At present, a person receiving such services has the option of making a claim against the federal government, or of suing the individual for damages. In view of the increase in the number, and dollar-value of malpractice suits, this coverage is considered necessary to permit the agency to attract individuals to serve in projects which involve medical treatment, and to provide full protection to volunteers presently involved in these types of projects.

New subsection (g) is made necessary by a recent opinion of the Solicitor of Labor that volunteers who are receiving Aid to Families with Dependent Children (AFDC) are required to enroll in the Work Incentive program (WIN) established by P.L. 90–248 (42 U.S.C. § 630 et seq.). WIN requires that, to be eligible for AFDC (and, under recent legislation, food stamps), recipients, with certain exceptions, are required to register for, seek, and, if it is available, accept employment. Some volunteers who were eligible for benefits prior to enrollment as volunteers, are entitled, under Section 404(g) of the Act, to exclude their volunteer allowances and stipends in computing their eligibility for public assistance. That provision was intended to permit low-income persons, with dependents, to serve as volunteers, while continuing to receive the public assistance necessary to support their dependents.

The requirement that volunteers register for, and seek employment as a pre-condition to receiving the benefits to which they are otherwise entitled, is clearly in conflict with this objective, and with the Congressional and agency intent that low-income persons be encouraged to serve as volunteers. It also is in direct conflict with the legislatively-mandated requirement that VISTA volunteers be enrolled for periods of service of at least one year. Planning for the service of low-income VISTA's will be much more difficult if their service can be interrupted at any time to require the volunteer to seek work, or accept employment. This amendment reaffirms the basic concept of ACTION's full-time programs that volunteer service provides a positive benefit to the persons served, and should be permitted to continue without interruption for the full period of the volunteer's service.

Section 11 amends section 417 of the Act in two respects: Subsection (a) adds a new sentence to section 417(a) which provides that the services of volunteers receiving support under the Act are deemed to be Federal financial assistance for the purposes of Title VI of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. The proposed amendment is intended to remove any doubt that the remedies available under Title VI are available to volunteers in and beneficiaries of projects to which ACTION assigns volunteers, but does not otherwise provide financial assistance, in cases of discrimination on the basis of race, color or national origin. It would also make clear that sponsors of ACTION volunteers who do not receive monetary assistance, but who receive the services of ACTION volunteers are required to give the assurances against discrimination required by section 417 equally with recipients of financial assistance.

Subsection (b) requires that all personnel actions affecting individuals enrolled as full-time volunteers or part-time volunteers serving at least 20 hours per week shall be made free from any discrimination based on race, color, religion, sex, or national origin. This requirement also covers applicants for enrollment, and would cover such matters as enrollment, termination and assignment of volunteers.

The Director of ACTION is authorized to provide appropriate remedies to effectuate these policies, and to issue necessary rules, regulations, or other documents necessary to implement the legislation. The Director is also required to assure that a volunteer applicant who has filed a complaint shall be notified of final action on it.

The complainant may, within 30 days of receipt of notice of final action, or after one hundred-eighty days from the filing of a complaint, and until final action is taken by the agency, file a civil action as provided in section 706 of the Civil Rights Act of 1964, as amended (42 U.S.C. § 2000e-5), and the provisions of section 706(f) through (k) govern any such civil actions.

At present, volunteers and volunteer applicants have no specific remedy against discrimination by the ACTION agency, since they are not employees and are therefore not covered by section 717 of the Civil Rights Act of 1964. Volunteers are entitled, under the agency grievance procedure, to file a grievance if they believe they have been subjected to discrimination. However, applicants have no such remedy. The section is specifically restricted to full-time volunteers and volunteers enrolled for at least twenty hours per week because the agency does not have a direct relationship with other part-time volunteers who serve under grants.

Section 12(a) amends section 501 of the Act to authorize the appropriation of $48,239,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, and of such sums as may be necessary for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1980 for programs under Title I of the Act. It also deletes the requirement that not less than $29,600,000 of the sums appropriated for Title I be expended on programs designed to eliminate poverty and poverty-related human, social environmental problems, and the requirement that, of this sum, not less than $22,300,000 be expended on VISTA. Also eliminated is a provision that sums authorized to be appropriated in excess of $37,600,000 shall be apportioned to provide a commensurate increase for Part A programs. It is believed that these restrictions, which make the expansion of Title I programs interdependent, are unnecessary; and inhibit the agency's ability to develop individual programs in the most beneficial and efficient manner. The authorization of such sums as may be necessary for fiscal year 1978 is retained because of the pending request for a supplemental appropriation.

Section 12(b) amends section 502 of the Act to authorize the appropriation of $57,940,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979 and of such sums as may be necessary for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1980 for Older American Volunteer Programs under Title II of the Act.

Section 12(c) amends section 504 of the Act, which authorizes administrative expenses associated with programs under the Domestic Volunteer Service Act, to authorize the appropriation of such sums as may be necessary for such expenses for the fiscal years ending September 30, 1979 and September 30, 1980.

Section 13 amends Public Law 99-130 (89 Stat. 684) by striking out the second sentence of section 5(b). Section 5(a) of Public Law 99-130 amended section 105(a)(1) of the Domestic Volunteer Service Act of 1973 to authorize an increase in the maximum end of service stipend which can be paid to VISTA volunteers from $50 per month to $75 per month. The second sentence of section 5(b) provides that this authorized increase shall only be effective to the extent that it is specifically provided for in each year's appropriation act.

This provision was inserted in recognition of the fact that an increase in the end of service stipend could only be provided by decreasing the number of volunteers who are enrolled, unless additional funds for the increase are provided in an appropriation act. The circumstances which made this amendment necessary no longer exist. Additional funds for a stipend increase have been requested as part of the general appropriation request for VISTA. The requirement that these funds be specifically identified in the appropriation each year is now an unnecessary and cumbersome requirement, which should be deleted.●

By Mr. LEAHY:

S. 2824. A bill to amend, revise, and consolidate the provisions of the child nutrition programs authorized by the National School Lunch Act, as amended, and the Child Nutrition Act of 1966, as amended, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Agriculture, Nutrition, and Forestry.

NATIONAL CHILD NUTRITION ACT OF 1978

● Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, I am introducing today a bill to amend, revise, and consolidate the provisions of the child nutrition programs authorized by the National School Lunch Act and Child Nutrition Act. This act, the National Child Nutrition Act of 1978, brings together for the first time all Federal child nutrition programs. The act is designed to streamline and simplify the existing Federal programs. By doing so, I believe these important nutrition programs will be given a new vitality and emphasis and thereby made available to all children who are in need of the benefits provided.

The legislation is based upon a draft developed by the National Child Nutrition Coalition, and its legislative task force. This coalition worked for several months exploring suggestions for improving the operation and availability of child nutrition programs. I thank them for their efforts and proposals and although my bill does not completely reflect all their suggestions, I will insure that all their ideas receive full discussion.

This bill provides a more coordinated approach to the two oldest programs, the national school lunch and breakfast programs, by providing for a unified school meals program. This unification will make it clear that both programs are of equal importance to a child's adequate nutrition, and that the two programs must work together to be truly effective.

Breakfast is a very important meal for all age groups, but particularly for growing children. Yet, only about 14 percent of our country's nutritionally needy children are able to participate in the school breakfast program because of lack of availability. Breakfast can make a significant positive contribution to the quality of a child's dietary intake.

In addition, several studies have shown a clear relationship between eating breakfast and the ability to learn and perform in school. A hungry child cannot perform to his full potential in the classroom. He has trouble paying attention and concentrating, diminishing his ability to learn no matter how skilled the teacher or advanced the learning aids. It is unfortunate that this meal is the one most likely to be neglected. Surveys of breakfast habits have shown that children in all socioeconomic groups omit breakfast or eat an inadequate meal. Where schools have taken advantage of the opportunity to provide their students breakfast, school personnel are impressed with the improvements in physical well-being, learning abilities, behavior and attendance. I believe that schools should play a major role, through the breakfast program, in alleviating hunger, improving the overall nutritional status of the children, teaching good food habits, and increasing the capacity of children to learn.

Although the national school breakfast program was first established in 1966, and made permanent in 1972, expansion benefits has been disappointingly slow, and many children whose nutrition and educational development would benefit by participation do not have access to the program. Incentives, encouragement, exhortation, and past legislative requirements have not been effective in bringing about meaningful expansion. In recognition of the importance of this program, my bill requires implementation of the school breakfast program in those schools where a substantial number of children are eligible for free and reduced-price meals, in accordance with standards established by the Secretary of Agriculture. The bill does not contain a specific figure or percentage of needy children which would justify implementation of the breakfast program, but I do intend to suggest such a figure during committee debates, based upon a thorough examination of data, information from the hearings that will be held on this bill, and discussions with all concerned individuals to insure that the expansion of the program is both meaningful and achievable.

In order to accomplish our goals of improving program availability and operation, my bill will increase the amount of administrative expense monies a State may receive, to a maximum of 2 percent of the total program funds. The Secretary is required to reimburse each State, within this maximum, in an amount sufficient to insure effective and efficient implementation and operation of the programs. To provide for program stability and to encourage program planning, State's are guaranteed a minimum amount of administrative expense money, or the amount it received in fiscal year 1978, whichever is more.

Another provision of this legislation will encourage effective planning by each State agency, and will enable the Secretary and concerned citizens to be aware of the State planning process and projected State actions. This provision, the State planning section, merely sets out in the legislation that we, and the Secretary, expect to see in State plans submitted to the Department describing how the State agencies will utilize funds authorized under the act. The planning process is a crucial one; it provides a blueprint for State actions, and an information and monitoring tool to the Secretary. It must be a meaningful document if it is to be effective.

Specific actions that should be undertaken to ensure implementation and operation of the programs are set forth, as well as specific information that should be gathered to target needy areas and children. Much of the material is now being collected; my bill will ensure that it is presented in a meaningful, intelligible, and useful format, so that State officials, local concerned parents and advocates, and Members of Congress are able to evaluate the State planning process.

Two other provisions in my bill relate directly to improving the quality of the meals served and the availability of equipment in furtherance of expansion and meal improvement. The food service equipment section of the bill recognizes the three equally important priorities for these funds: assisting schools with no meal programs to implement a school meal program; providing funds needed to assist a school with only one program to implement the nonavailable program; and upgrading the quality of the meal service provided.

Most important, my bill increases the authorization level for funds under this section. It is essential, if we want meaningful improvement and expansion in the school feeding programs, to provide the necessary support to our local schools to enable them to effectively implement and improve meal service. We can do this by providing equipment funds in an amount sufficient to do the job.

Under current law, one-third of the available funds are reserved for no-program schools. If these funds are not utilized, because a State has done an effective job of implementing the program, the funds revert to the Secretary for reallocation, under the same reservation. My provision will enable the Secretary to reallocate unused, and unusable, no-program funds to State agencies for use in the other two priority categories—two program schools, and then to general meal quality improvement. This provision should insure that all moneys available are indeed used to improve program service to the maximum extent possible.

In our efforts to expand participation, we must also recognize the importance of improving meal quality. My bill does so by revising the nutrition requirement section which gives the Secretary authority to develop mean patterns and plans. The revised section provides flexibility to the Secretary by broadening the nutritional research data to be taken into account. It also provides that the Secretary develop methodologies which will assist State and local agencies to review and monitor nutritional requirements and plate waste, and specifies the provision of guidelines and technical assistance by the Secretary to the State agency to help them effectively improve their program operation. Several of the provisions in this section are now contained in the Secretary's proposed regulations changing the meal pattern requirements. I believe, however, that in recognition of their importance, and to reflect the congressional concern about this area, these provisions should be clearly stated in the legislation, as I have done.

I believe that provisions in this bill will bring about much needed clarification and improvement in the child nutrition programs. Substantial discussion is needed for the exact details of some provisions, and I look forward to participating in that debate. The National Child Nutrition Coalition has played an important and active role in gathering information about program operation, and improvements needed to make our goals meaningful, and I commend them on their efforts. The unification and consolidation of the National School Lunch Act and Child Nutrition Act of 1966 into the National Child Nutrition Act is an important one which I fully support. I anticipate, and welcome, discussion on specific proposals contained in this legislation.

Finally, in order to facilitate understanding of this comprehensive measure, I ask unanimous consent that a section-by-section explanation of this bill be printed in the RECORD following the bill.

There being no objection, the bill and explanation were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2824

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "National Child Nutrition Act of 1978."

STATEMENT OF PURPOSE

"SEC. 2. As a matter of national nutrition and health policy and as a measure of national security, it is the purpose and intent of Congress to safeguard the health and well-being of the Nation's children and to encourage the consumption of nutritious domestic agricultural commodities and other food. The Congress finds that increased utilization of food in establishing and maintaining child nutrition programs will promote the distribution in a beneficial manner of our agricultural abundances and will strengthen our agricultural economy, as well as result in more orderly marketing and distribution of food. In recognition of the demonstrated relationship between food, good nutrition and health, and the capacity of children to develop and learn, it is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress that the child nutrition program shall be expanded and strengthened under the authority of the Secretary of Agriculture by assisting the States, through grants-in-aid and other means in providing an adequate supply of food and other facilities for the establishment, maintenance, operation and expansion of all child nutrition programs, thereby more effectively meeting the nutritional needs of our children.

Notwithstanding any other provision of law, any funds appropriated to carry out the provisions of this Act shall remain available for the purposes of the Act for which appropriated until expended. The sums appropriated for any fiscal year pursuant to the authorization contained herein, excluding the sum specified in Section 6 of this Act, shall be available to the Secretary for supplying agricultural commodities and other foods, and for the costs of operating the programs in accordance with the provisions of this Act.

"SCHOOL MEALS PROGRAM

"SEC. 5(a)(1) For each fiscal year there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, such sums as may be necessary to enable the Secretary to carry out the provisions of this section. For each fiscal year the Secretary shall make food assistance payments, at such times, as he may determine, from the sums appropriated therefore, to each State educational agency, in a total amount equal to the result obtained by multiplying the number and types of meals (consisting of a combination of foods which meet the minimum nutritional requirements prescribed by the Secretary under section 15 of this Act) served during such fiscal year to children in schools in such States, which participate in the school meals program under this Act under agreements with such State educational agency, by the appropriate meal payment rate per meal for such fiscal year determined by the Secretary to be necessary to carry out the purposes of this Act. Any school shall receive the school meals program upon its request.

"(2) In any fiscal year, the national average basic payment established by the Secretary shall not be less than 11.50 cents per breakfast and 14.50 cents per lunch. Free and reduced-price meal payments shall be made to each State educational agency in an amount not less than 21.75 cents for each reduced-price breakfast, 55 cents for each reduced-price lunch, 28.75 cents for each free breakfast and 65 cents for each free lunch: Provided, that the Secretary may establish appropriate adjustments reflecting the cost differentials in Alaska, Hawaii, Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, Virgin Islands, Guam, American Samoa, the Northern Marianas and the Trust Territories of the Pacific. The meal payment rates shall be adjusted semi-annually, provided that the first such adjustment shall be made January 1, 1979.

"(3) Except as provided in Section 10 of this Act, the free and reduced-price meal payments made to each State agency during each fiscal year under the provisions of this section shall be used by such State agency to assist schools in financing the cost of providing free and reduced-price meals served to children pursuant to section 9 of this Act, within a maximum per meal amount established by the Secretary. Such maximum amounts established by the Secretary shall not be less than 94.50 cents per lunch and 50.25 cents per breakfast. Food assistance payments to any State under this section shall be adjusted semi-annually, provided that the first such adjustment shall be made January 1, 1979.

"(b)(1) The Secretary shall make additional payments for breakfasts served to children qualifying for a free or reduced-price meal at schools that are in severe need. The maximum payment for each such free breakfast shall be the higher of:

(A) the free meal payment established by the Secretary for free breakfasts plus 10 cents or

(B) 45 cents, which shall be adjusted semi-annually.

The maximum payment for each such reduced-price breakfast shall be 5 cents less than the maximum payment for each free breakfast as determined under this section.

"(2) Each State educational agency shall establish eligibility standards for providing additional assistance to schools in severe need where the rate per meal established by the Secretary is insufficient to carry out an effective breakfast program in such a school. Such eligibility standards shall be submitted to the Secretary for approval and included in the State Plan of Child Nutrition Operations required by section 19 of this Act. Pursuant to those State eligibility standards, a school, upon the submission of appropriate documentation about the need circumstances in that school and the school's eligibility for additional assistance, shall be entitled to receive 100 percent of the operating costs of the breakfast program, including the costs of obtaining, preparing, and serving food, or the meal reimbursement rate specified in paragraph (b)(1) of this section, whichever is less. In those States where State law establishes a requirement that particular schools implement a school breakfast program, those schools shall qualify for payments under subsection (b)(1) of the section.

"(c) The Congress finds that although the benefits of a nutritious breakfast are well documented, substantial numbers of children are not receiving school breakfast benefits under this Act, and therefore are not receiving adequate nutrition. To further the purposes of this Act, and assure all needy children of the opportunity to receive adequate nutrition, the school breakfast program shall be implemented within one school year from enactment of this section, in accordance with requirements established by the Secretary, in all schools in which a substantial number and percentage of children are eligible for free and reduced-price meals. Each State agency shall maintain such records as may be necessary for it to determine when a school within the State is required to implement the breakfast program in accordance with the criteria set out herein.

"(d)(1) In the case of any school in which 80 percent of the children participating in the school meal program are eligible for free or reduced-price meals, the school may request free and reduced-price payments to be determined for that year and the year following, on the basis of the number of free meals or reduced-price meals, as the case may be, that are served by that school during the school year for which the request is made, and the number of free meals and reduced-price meals served during the second year to other children determined for that year to be eligible for such meals. In the case of any school that (1) elects to serve all children in that school free meals during any period of three successive school years and (2) pay, from sources other than Federal funds, for the costs of serving such meals which are in excess of the value of assistance received under this Act with respect to the number of meals served during that period, the Secretary shall pay to the State educational agency with respect to that school during that period on the basis of the number of meals determined under the succeeding sentence. For purposes of making payments in accordance with the preceding sentence, the number of meals served by a school to children eligible for free meals and reduced-price meals during each school year of the three-school-year period shall be deemed to be the number of meals served by that school to children eligible for free meals and reduced-price meals during the first school year of such period, unless that school elects, for purposes of computing the amount of such payments, to determine on a more frequent basis the number of children eligible for free and reduced-price meals who are served meals during such period.

"(2) Each school participating in the school meals program under this Act shall report each month to its State educational agency the number of children in the school who received paid, free or reduced-price lunches and the number of children who received paid, reduced-price or free breakfasts during the immediately preceding month. Each participating school shall provide an estimate, as of October 1 and March 1 of each year, of the number of children who are eligible for a free or reduced-price lunch or breakfast.

"(3) The State educational agency of each State shall report to the Secretary each month the number of children in the State who received paid, reduced-price and free lunches, and who received paid, reduced-price and free breakfasts, during the immediately preceding month, and shall certify that the reports required by subsection (d)(2) will be available for review in the office of the State educational agency for not less than one year.

"FOOD SERVICE EQUIPMENT ASSISTANCE

"SEC. 6. (a) There is hereby authorized to be appropriated 75 million dollars for each of the fiscal years 1979, 1980, 1981, 1982, which shall be available to the Secretary for the purpose of providing food service equipment assistance to assist the States through grants-in-aid and other means to schools drawing attendance from areas in which poor economic conditions exist in order to supply them with equipment, other than land or buildings, for the storage, preparation, transportation, and serving of food to enable such schools to establish, maintain and expand school food service programs. In the case of a non-profit private school, such equipment shall be for the use of such school principally in connection with child feeding programs.

"(') (1) Of the funds appropriated for the purposes of this section, 33⅓ percent initially shall be allocated by the Secretary to assist school without a food service program. The funds so allocated shall be used by the State, or the Secretary in the case of non-profit private schools, to assist schools without a food service program so that they can implement such a program or programs.

"(2) If the funds appropriated for the purposes of this section, 33⅓ percent initially shall be allocated to the Secretary for school offering either lunch or breakfast meals to assist them to implement a second meal service. The funds so allocated shall be used by the State, or the Secretary in the case of non-profit schools, to obtain the non-food assistance that is needed to implement, for the first time, concurrent operation of lunch and breakfast services in a school.

"(3) of the funds appropriated for the purposes of this section, 33⅓ percent initially shall be allocated to the Secretary for schools that need equipment (including the replacement or repair of equipment that is impaired or antiquated) to prepare and cook hot meals at the schools or at a kitchen that serves the schools and that is operated by the local school food authority or by a non-profit private school or the authority that is responsible for the administration of one or more non-profit private schools. The funds so allocated shall be used by the State, or the Secretary in the case of non-profit private schools, to obtain or replace equipment that is used for the purposes of permitting the school food authority or non-profit private school to inaugurate or continue the self-preparation of school meals.

"(c)(1) Of the funds allocated pursuant to paragraph (1) of subsection (b) of this section, the Secretary shall apportion the funds so allocated among the States on the basis of the ratio of the number of children in each State enrolled in schools without a food service program bears to the number of children in each State enrolled in schools without a food service program. In those States in which the Secretary administers the food service equipment assistance program in non-profit private schools, the Secretary shall withhold from the funds apportioned to any such State pursuant to this paragraph and paragraph (1) of subsection (b) of this section an amount which bears the same ratio to such funds as the number of children enrolled in non-profit private schools without a food service program in such State bears to the total number of children enrolled in all schools without a food service program in such State. If any State cannot use all the funds apportioned to it under the provisions of this paragraph, the Secretary shall make a further apportionment to the remaining States for use only in assisting schools without a food service program. If after such further apportionment any funds received under this paragraph remain unused, the Secretary shall immediately apportion such remaining funds among the States for use in obtaining equipment to implement a second meal service, and such funds shall be allocated among the States on the basis of the ratio of the number of children in each State enrolled in schools which provide only one meal service bears to the number of children in all States enrolled in schools.

"(2) Of the funds allocated pursuant to paragraph (2) of subsection (b) of this section, the Secretary shall apportion the funds so allocated among the States on the basis of the ratio of the number of children in each State enrolled in schools which provide only one meal service bears to the number of children in all States enrolled in schools which provide only one meal service. In those States in which the Secretary administers the food service equipment assistance program in non-profit private schools, the Secretary shall withhold from the funds apportioned to any such State pursuant to this paragraph and paragraph (2) of subsection (b) of this section an amount which bears the same ratio to such funds as the number of children enrolled in non-profit private schools with only one meal service in such State bears to the total number of children enrolled in all schools with only one meal service in such State. If any State cannot use all the funds apportioned to it under the provisions of this paragraph, the Secretary shall make a further apportionment to the remaining States for use only in assisting schools to implement a second meal service. If after such further apportionment any funds received under this paragraph remains unused, the Secretary shall immediately apportion such remaining funds among the States for use in obtaining equipment to permit schools to self-prepare and cook hot meals, and such funds shall be allocated among the States on the basis of the ratio of the number of children in each State enrolled in schools bears to the number of children in all of the States enrolled in schools.

"(3) Of the funds allocated pursuant to paragraph (3) of subsection (b) of this section, the Secretary shall apportion the funds so allocated among the States on the basis of the ratio of the number of children in each State enrolled in schools bears to the number of children in all of the States enrolled in schools. In those States in which the Secretary administers the food service equipment assistance program in non-profit private schools, the Secretary shall withhold from the funds apportioned to any such State pursuant to this paragraph and paragraph (3) of subsection (b) of this section an amount which bears the same ratio to such funds as the number of children enrolled in non-profit private schools bears to the total number of children enrolled in all schools. If any State cannot use all of the funds apportioned to it under the provisions of this paragraph, the Secretary shall make a further apportionment to the remaining States in the manner set forth in this paragraph.

"(d) Funds apportioned and paid to any State for the purpose of this section shall be disbursed by the State educational agency to assist schools which draw attendance from areas in which poor economic conditions exist and which have no, or inadequate, equipment to conduct school food service programs, and to acquire such equipment. In the selection of schools to receive assistance under this section, the State educational agency shall require applicant schools to provide justification of the need for such assistance and the inability of the school to finance the food service equipment needed. Disbursements to any school may be made by advances or reimbursements, only after approval by the State educational agency of a request by the school for funds, accompanied by a detailed description of the equipment to be acquired and the plans for the use thereof in effectively meeting the nutritional needs of children in the school, using to the maximum extent practicable self-preparation of meals.

"(e) Payments to any State of funds under this section shall be made upon the condition that at least one-fourth of the cost of the equipment financed shall be borne by funds from sources within the State, except that such a condition shall not apply with respect to funds used under this section to assist any school that is expecially needy, as determined by criteria established by each State and approved by the Secretary. Such criteria shall be published in the State Plan of Child Nutrition Operations required by section 16 of this Act.

"(f) The State agency, upon notification by the Secretary of that State's apportionments of funds under this section, shall notify all schools of the availability of these funds, and the criteria for receipt of funds. The notification shall also set forth the State's criteria by which schools may qualify for especially needy status, thereby allowing them to receive funds without providing funds from their own resources. A similar notice shall be sent by the State agency upon the notification from the Secretary of any funds received by way of reapportionment.

"(g)(1) Funds authorized for the purposes of this section shall be used only for facilities that enable the schools or local public or private non-profit institutions, including kitchens that serve the schools operated by the local school food authority, under the conditions prescribed in paragraph (2) of this subsection, to prepare and cook hot meals or receive hot meals at the school or institution, unless the school can demonstrate to the satisfaction of the State (or, in the case of non-profit private schools in the States where the Secretary administers the food service equipment program in such schools, to the satisfaction of the Secretary) than an alternative method of meal preparation is necessary for the introduction of the school lunch or breakfast program in such school: Provided, that a school eligible to participate in programs under this section may enter into an agreement with other public or private non-profit institutions to provide such programs for children attending the school.

"(2) If a school authorized to receive funds under this section cannot establish a food service program of hot meals prepared and cooked by the school, or received by the school, and the school enters into an agreement with a public or private non-profit institution to provide school lunch and/or breakfast services for childern attending the school, the funds provided under this section may be used for food service facilities to be located at such institution, if (A) the school retains legal title to such facilities and, (B) in the case of funds made available under paragraphs (1) and (2) of subsection (b) of this section, the institution would otherwise be without such facilities.

"(h) If, in any State, the State educational agency is prohibited by law from administering the program authorized by this section in non-profit private schools within the State, the Secretary shall administer such program in such private schools.

"PAYMENTS TO STATES

"SEC. 7. Funds appropriated to carry out section 5 during any fiscal year shall be made available to the States for disbursement by State educational agencies; for the purpose of assisting schools of the States in supplying (a) agricultural commodities and other foods for consumption by children and (b) food service equipment assistance in furtherance of the school meals program authorized under this Act. Such payments to any State in any fiscal year shall be made upon condition that each dollar thereof will be matched by $3 during such year from sources within the State determined by the Secretary as being expended in connection with the school meals program under this Act: Provided, That States shall not be required to match payments for free and reduced price meals made to participating schools. In the case of any State whose per capita income is less than the per capita income of the United States, the matching required for any fiscal or school year shall be decreased by the percentage which the State per capita income is below the per capita income of the United States. For the purpose of determining whether the matching requirements of this section and section 10, respectively, have been met, the reasonable value of donated services, supplies, facilities and equipment as certified, respectively, by the State educational agency and in the case of schools receiving funds pursuant to section 10, by such schools, but not the cost or value of land, or of the acquisition, construction, or alteration of buildings, or commodities donated by the Secretary, or of Federal contributions), may be regarded as funds from sources within the State expended in connection with the school meals program. For the school year beginning in 1978, State revenue (other than revenues derived from the program) appropriated or used specifically for program purposes (other than salaries and administrative expenses at the State, as distinguished from local, level) shall constitute at least 10 percent of the matching requirement for the preceding school year, which level shall be met with respect to the food assistance payments of each State. The State revenues made available pursuant to the preceding sentence shall be disbursed to schools, to the extent the State deems practicable, in such a manner that each school receives the same proportionate share of such revenues as it receives of the funds paid or payable to the State for the same year under section 5 of this Act.

"STATE DISBURSEMENTS TO SCHOOLS

"SEC. 8. Funds paid to any State during any fiscal year pursuant to section 7 of this Act shall be disbursed by the State educational agency in accordance with such agreements approved by the Secretary as may be entered into by such State agency and the schools in the State. Such disbursement to any school shall be made for the purpose of assisting schools to (a) finance the cost of obtaining agricultural commodities and other foods for consumption by children in the school meals program and the operational costs, and (b) food service equipment assistance in connection with such programs. Such costs may include in addition to the purchase price of agricultural commodities and other foods, the cost of processing, distributing, transporting, storing, handling, preparing, serving, and supervising thereof. In no event shall such disbursement for food to any school for any fiscal year exceed an amount determined by multiplying the number of meals served in the school in the school meals program under this Act during such year by the maximum food assistance payments prescribed by the Secretary for the type of meal served. In any fiscal year in which the national average basic payment per meal determined under section 5 is increased above the amount prescribed in the previous fiscal year, the maximum food assistance payment, for the type of meal served, shall be increased by a like amount. Food assistance payments to schools under this section may be made in advance or by way of reimbursement in accordance with procedures prescribed by the Secretary.

"INCOME REQUIREMENTS

"SEC. 9. (a) No later than June 1 of each fiscal year, the Secretary shall issue revised income poverty guidelines for use during the subsequent 12-month period from July through June. Such revisions shall be made by multiplying the income poverty guideline currently in effect by the change in the Consumer Price Index for the 12-month period ending in April of such fiscal year. Children from families with an annual income of 25 percent or less above the applicable family size income levels prescribed by the Secretary shall be served a free meal. Children from families with annual income between 25 percent and 95 percent above the applicable family size income levels shall be served meals at a reduced price: Provided, that the cost of a reduced-price breakfast shall not exceed 10 cents and the cost of a reduced-price lunch shall not exceed 20 cents. Local school authorities shall announce publicly and in writing to each parent such income guidelines on or about the opening of each school term. In areas where there is a known population of non-English speaking families, these notices shall be bilingual. Local school authorities shall make determinations with respect to the annual incomes of any household solely on the basis of a statement executed in such form as the Secretary may prescribe by an adult member of such household. In situations of special hardship, such as major catastrophe or casualty loss, the school may, within its discretion, provide for participation of a child in the free or reduced-price meal program under this section. No physical segregation of, or other discrimination against, any child eligible for a free meal or a reduced-price meal shall be made by the school nor shall there be any overt identification of any child by special tokens or tickets, announced or published lists of names, work requirements, or any other means.

"(b) The State educational agency shall, in cooperation with local schools, publicize the availability of the school meals programs, including eligibility criteria for participation. To maximize the effort to expand the program to children and parents, such information shall be distributed to governmental offices, public and private health and medical organizations, and church, civic, and community groups. Such materials shall be bilingual in areas where substantial numbers of households speak a language other than English.

"(c) School meals programs under this Act shall be operated on a nonprofit basis. Each school shall, insofar as practicable, utilize in its meal program commodities designated from time to time by the Secretary as being in abundance, either nationally or in the school area, or commodities donated by the Secretary. Commodities purchased under the authority of section 32 of the Act of August 24, 1935 (42 Stat. 774), as amended, may be donated by the Secretary to schools, in accordance with the needs as determined by local school authorities, for utilization in the school meal program under this Act as well as to other schools carrying out nonprofit school meal programs and institutions authorized to receive such commodities. The Secretary is authorized to prescribe terms and conditions respecting the use of commodities donated under such section 32, under section 416 of the Agricultural Act of 1949, as amended, and under section 709 of the Food and Agricultural Act of 1965, as amended, as will maximize the nutritional and financial contributions of such donated commodities in such schools and institutions. The requirement of this section relating to the service of meals without cost or at a reduced cost shall apply to the meal program of any school utilizing commodities donated under any of the provisions of law referred to in the preceding sentence.

"DISBURSEMENT TO SCHOOLS BY THE SECRETARY

"SEC. 10. If, in any State, the State educational agency is not permitted by law to disburse the funds paid to it under this Act to any of the nonprofit private schools in the State, or is not permitted by law to match Federal funds made available for use by such schools, the Secretary shall disburse the funds directly to such schools within the State for the same purpose and subject to the same conditions as are authorized or required with respect to the disbursements to schools within the State by the State educational agency, including the requirement that any such payment or payments shall be matched, in the proportion specified in section 7 for such State, by funds from sources within the States expended by such schools within the State participating in the school meal program under this Act. Such funds shall not be considered a part of the funds constituting the matching funds under the terms of section 7.

"SPECIAL MILK

"SEC. 11. There is hereby authorized to be appropriated for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979, and for each succeeding fiscal year, such sums as may be necessary to enable the Secretary, under such rules and regulations as he may deem in the public interest, to encourage consumption of fluid milk by children in the United States in (1) nonprofit schools of high school grade and under, and (2) non-profit nursery schools, child care centers, settlement houses, summer camps, and similar non-profit institutions devoted to the care and training of children. Any school or non-profit child care institution shall receive the special milk program upon its request. Children who qualify for free lunches under guidelines set forth by the Secretary shall also be eligible for free milk, when milk is made available at times other than the period of meal service in outlets that operate a food service program under section 5 of this Act. For the fiscal year ending June 30, 1978, and for subsequent school years, the minimum rate of reimbursement for a half-pint of milk served in schools and other eligible institutions shall not be less than 6.25 cents per half-pint served to eligible children, and such minimum rate of reimbursement shall be adjusted on an annual basis each school year to reflect changes in the wholesale price index for milk of the Consumer Price Index published by the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the Department of Labor. Such adjustment shall be computed to the nearest one-fourth cent. Notwithstanding any other provision of this section, in no event shall the minimum rate of reimbursement exceed the cost of the school or institution of milk served to children.

"CHILD CARE FOOD PROGRAM

"SEC. 12. Section 17 of the National School Lunch Act shall be redesignated section 12 of the National Child Nutrition Act of 1978.

"SUPPLEMENTAL FOOD PROGRAM FOR WOMEN, INFANTS, AND CHILDREN

"SEC. 13. Section 17 of the Child Nutrition Act of 1966 shall be redesignated section 13 of the National Child Nutrition Act of 1978.

"SUMMER FOOD PROGRAM

"SEC. 14. Section 13 of the National School Lunch Act of 1946 shall be redesigned section 14 of the National Child Nutrition Act of 1978.

"NUTRITION REQUIREMENTS

"SEC. 15. (a) Meals served by the schools and sponsors participating in the child feeding programs shall consist of a variety of foods which when served together in the form or breakfast, lunch, dinner, and/or snacks meet the nutritional requirements of participants as prescribed by the Secretary on the basis of the most recent analysis of nutrition research. In developing these nutritional requirements the Secretary shall take into account research in the following areas: (1) the nutritional requirements of the participants; (2) the relationship of particular dietary patterns to health status; (3) the nutritional and health-related aspects of food preparation, processing, storage, and delivery methods; and (4) any other research which is related to the provision of a nutritional and healthful meal to participants. A one-ounce serving of meat or meat alternative shall be served to participants in the School Breakfast Program at least two times per week. These nutrition requirements shall not be construed to prohibit the substitution of foods to accommodate the medical or other special dietary need of individual students. The Secretary shall study on a regular basis the nutritional quality of meals eaten by the participants in the child feeding programs, and shall require that, whenever feasible, the nutritional requirements of the participants be provided as natural constituents of foods and in foods that do not contain additives.

"(b) The Secretary shall provide the kind and quality of commodities which enhance the nutritional quality of the meal pattern by increasing the variety of foods available, by acquiring foods which contribute to children's present and future health status based on the most recent analysis of nutrition research, and by facilitating their distribution, storage, and use. The Secretary shall compile, develop, and disseminate a variety of meal patterns which meet children's nutritional requirements, are practicable in schools and institutions, and increase the overall quality of the meals. Foods and meals served in the child feeding programs shall be considered as part of participants' nutrition education and therefore shall exemplify nutritional and healthful food habits.

"(c) The Secretary shall encourage the local school food authority and sponsors to: (1) provide a selection of foods within each component of a meal so that choice by participants is possible; (2) serve food which takes into consideration the cultural and ethnic food habits of participants; and (3) undertake regular monitoring of the acceptability of foods served.

"(d) The Secretary shall develop methodologies whereby local school food authorities may monitor food waste or consistent rejection of menu items, investigate the causes, and remedy the problems. Any procedure designed to diminish waste of foods which are served by schools participating in the child feeding programs shall include local educational agency and student participation, and shall not endanger the nutritional integrity of the lunches served by such schools.

"(e) The Secretary shall prepare, review on a regular basis, and amend when necessary, a set of performance guidelines which outline the objectives of the child feeding programs and how these objectives can best be achieved by local school food authorities and participating institutions. These guidelines shall include, but are not limited to: (1) environment and atmosphere of the eating place, including ventilation, space per child, and lighting; (2) optimum time that should be allowed for eating meals; (3) appropriate scheduling of meals; (4) presence and role of adults in eating place; (5) criteria for foods which may be introduced into the child feeding programs; (6) variation of meal patterns; (7) the most desirable meal delivery, food preparation, and food processing methods; and (8) extent and kind of parent and student involvement upon which may be based self-evaluation by local school food authorities and participating institutions, and regular on-site reviews by State monitors.

"(f) The Secretary shall: (1) develop standards for the frequency of on-site reviews by State monitors, and shall encourage follow-up with appropriate technical assistance to local program staff, based on the results of on-site reviews; (2) periodically assess the training, technical assistance, and guidance materials needed by local food service personnel, giving special attention to the following areas: (A) food preparation for maximum palatability, attractiveness, and nutritional quality; (B) local self-evaluation of palatability, attractiveness, and overall student acceptability; and, (C) positive interaction and informal nutrition education experiences with children; (3) review the results of demonstration projects carried out under Section 10 of Public Law 95-166 and shall disseminate recommendations for improved programs to all school food authorities based on the project results; (4) examine successful child feeding programs and disseminate recommendations for improved programs to all school food authorities based on the successful programs' characteristics and experiences; and (5) conduct pilot projects which experiment with various approaches to improving meal quality and participation in child feeding programs and disseminate recommendations for improved programs to all school food service authorities based on the results of these projects.

"DIRECT FEDERAL EXPENDITURES

"SEC. 16(a) The funds provided by appropriation and transfer from other accounts for any fiscal year for carrying out the provisions of this Act, less (1) such funds as may be necessary to the Secretary for his administrative expense under this Act; (2) the amount apportioned by him for direct payments to States for programs under this Act; and (3) not to exceed one quarter of one percent of the funds appropriated for the preceding year for carrying out the programs under this Act, which per centum is hereby made available to the Secretary to supplement the nutritional benefits of these programs through pilot projects, studies, and evaluations of the plans developed pursuant to Sections 22 and 23 of this Act, shall be available to the Secretary during each year for direct expenditure by him for agricultural commodities and other foods to be distributed among the States and schools and service institutions participating in the food service program under this Act in accordance with the needs as determined by the local school and service institution authorities. Any school participating in food service programs under this Act may refuse to accept delivery of not more than 20 percent of the total value of agricultural commodities and other foods tendered to it in any school year; and if a school so refuses, that school may receive, in lieu of the refused commodities, other commodities to the extent that other commodities are available to the State during the year The provisions of law contained in the proviso of the Act of June 28, 1937 (50 Stat. 323), facilitating operations with respect to the purchase and disposition of surplus agricultural commodities under Section 32 of the Act approved August 24, 1935 (49 Stat. 774), as amended, shall, to the extent not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act, also be applicable to expenditures of funds by the Secretary under this Act. In making purchases of such agricultural commodities and other foods, the Secretary shall not issue specifications which restrict participation of local producers unless such specification will result in significant advantages to the food services programs authorized by this Act.

"(b) Not later than May 15 of each school year, the Secretary shall make an estimate of the value of agricultural commodities and other foods that will be delivered during that school year to States for the school meal program. If such estimated value is less than the total level of assistance authorized under section 17(c) of this Act the Secretary shall pay to each State educational agency, not later than June 15 of that school year, an amount of funds that is equal to the difference between the value of such deliveries and then programed for such State and the total level of assistance authorized under Section 17(c) of this Act. In any State in which the Secretary directly administers the school meal program in any of the schools of the State, the Secretary shall withhold from the funds to be paid to such State under the provisions of this Subsection an amount that bears the same ratio to the total of such payment as the number of meals served in schools in which the school meal program is directly administered by the Secretary during that school year bears to the total of such meals served under the school meal program in all the schools in such State in such school year. Each State educational agency, and the Secretary in the case of private schools in which the Secretary directly administers the school meal program, shall promptly and equitably disburse such funds to schools participating in the school meal program, and such disbursements shall be used by such schools to purchase United States agricultural commodities and other foods for their food service programs. Such foods shall be limited to the requirements for lunches and breakfasts for children as provided for in regulations issued by the Secretary.

"(c) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary, until such time as a supplemental appropriation may provide additional funds for the purpose of subsection (b) of this section, shall use funds appropriated by section 32 of the Act of August 24, 1935 (7 U.S.C. 612c) to make any payments to States authorized under such subsection. Any section 32 funds utilized to make such payments shall be reimbursed out of any supplemental appropriation hereafter enacted for the purpose of carrying out subsection (b) of this section and such reimbursement shall be deposited into the fund established pursuant to section 32 of the Act of August 24, 1935, to be available for the purposes of said Section 32.

"(d) Any funds made available under subsection (b) or (c) of this section shall not be subject to the State matching provisions of section 7 of this Act.

"COMMODITY DISTRIBUTION PROGRAM

"SEC. 17. (a) Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the Secretary, during the period beginning July 1, 1979, and ending September 10, 1983, shall (1) use funds available to carry out the provisions of section 32 of the Act of August 24, 1935 (7 U.S.C. 612c) which are not expended or needed to carry out such provisions, to purchase (without regard to the provisions of existing law governing the expenditure of public funds) agricultural commodities and their products of the types customarily purchased under such section, for donation to maintain the annually programed level of assistance for programs carried on under this Act, and Title VII of the Older Americans Act of 1935; (2) if stocks of the Commodity Credit Corporation are not available, use the funds of such Corporation to purchase agricultural commodities and their products of the types customarily available under section 416 of the Agricultural Act of 1949 (7 U.S.C. 1431), for such donation; and (3) the Secretary shall, to the maximum extent practicable, purchase commodities from sources local to the State in which such commodities will be delivered, and shall give special emphasis to meat alternatives, cereal, shortening and oil products, and fresh fruits and vegetables.

"(b) The Secretary may use funds appropriated from the general fund of the Treasury to purchase agricultural commodities and their products of the type customarily purchased for donation under Section 707(a)(4) of the Older Americans Act of 1965 (42 U.S.C. 3045f(a)(4)) or for cash payments in lieu of such donations under Section 707(d)(1) of such Act (42 U.S.C. 3045f(d)(1)).

"(c) For the year ending June 30, 1978, the national average value of donated food, or cash payment in lieu thereof, shall not be less than 12.75 cents per lunch and 3 cents per breakfast, and that amount shall be adjusted on an annual basis each July 1 after the school year ending July 1, 1978, to reflect changes in the Consumer Price Index. Such adjustment shall be computed to the nearest one-fourth cent. Notwithstanding any other provisions of this section, not less than 75 percent of the assistance provided under this subsection shall be in the form of donated foods for the school meals program.

"(d) Notwithstanding any other provisions of law, where a State phased out its commodity distribution facilities prior to June 30, 1974, such State may, for purposes of the programs authorized by this Act, elect to receive cash payments in lieu of donated foods. Where such an election is made, the Secretary shall make cash payments to such State in an amount equivalent in value to the donated foods that the State would otherwise have received if it had retained its commodity distribution facilities. The amount of cash payments shall be governed by subsection (c) of this section.

"(e) When such payments are made, the State educational agency shall promptly and equitably disburse any cash it receives in lieu of commodities to eligible schools and institutions, and such disbursements shall be used by such schools and institutions to purchase United States agricultural commodities and other foods for their food service programs.

"(f) The Secretary shall establish procedures which will: (1) insure that the views of local school districts and private nonprofit schools and institutions, with respect to the type of commodity assistance needed for child nutrition programs are fully and accurately reflected in reports to the Secretary by the State with respect to State commodity preferences and that such views are considered by the Secretary in the purchase and distribution of commodities and by the States in the allocation of such commodities among schools and institutions within the States; (2) solicit the views of States with respect to the acceptability of commodities; (3) insure that the timing of commodity deliveries to States is consistent with State school year calendars and that such deliveries occur with sufficient advance notice; (4) provide for systematic review of the costs and benefit of providing commodities of the kind and quantity that are suitable to the needs of local school districts and private nonprofit schools and institutions; and (5) make available technical assistance on the use of commodities available under this Act.

Within eighteen months after the date of the enactment of P.L. 95–166, the Secretary shall report to Congress on the impact of procedures established under this subsection, including the nutritional, economic, and admiistrative benefits of such procedures. In purchasing commodities for programs carried out under this Act, the Secretary shall establish procedures to ensure that contracts for the purchase of such commodities shall not be entered into unless the previous history and current patterns of the contracting party with respect to compliance with applicable meat inspection rules and with other appropriate standards relating to the wholesomeness of food for human consumption are taken into account.

"(g) Each State educational agency that receives food assistance payments under this section for any school year shall establish for such year an advisory council, which shall be composed of representatives of schools and institutions in the State that participate in the child nutrition programs. The Council shall advise such State agency with respect to the needs of such schools and institutions relating to the manner of selection and distribution of commodity assistance for such programs.

"STATE ADMINISTRATIVE EXPENSES

"SEC. 18. (a) The Secretary shall pay to each State for its administrative costs incurred pursuant to its administration of this Act an amount sufficient to reimburse the State for the efficient and effective implementation and operation of each program authorized pursuant to this Act: Provided, That such amounts shall be not less than 1 percent of more than 2 percent of the funds used by each State: Provided further, That in no case shall payment to a State agency be less than , nor shall any State receive less than was allocated to it for fiscal year 1978. The amounts paid to each State shall be in accordance with a formula developed by the Secretary and the funds alloted to the appropriate State agency, taking into account the Secretary's staffing plan formula for each program, current and potential program participation, need for program expansion, technical assistance, monitoring and such other factors as the Secretary determines appropriate to further the goals of this Act: Provided, That, where the Secretary is responsible for the operation of programs under this Act, the amount of administrative expenses which would be allocated to the State pursuant to this section shall be retained by the Secretary for the same purposes as the State agency.

"(c) Funds paid to a State under subsection (a) of this Section may be used to pay salaries, including employee benefits and travel expenses, for administrative supervisory personnel; for support services; for office equipment; and for staff development. Upon demonstration by a State agency that the administrative funds allocated to a program pursuant to this section are not necessary to the effective administration and expansion of that program, the Secretary may provide for the reserve of up to 1 per centum of the funds available for apportionment to any State to carry out special developmental projects to further the effectiveness of child feeding programs, and may provide for the transfer of funds to another child feeding program authorized by this Act on the basis of an approved State plan of operation for the use of the funds.

"(d) If any State agency agrees to assume responsibility for the administration of food service programs in nonprofit private schools or child care institutions that were previously administered by the Secretary, an appropriate adjustment shall be made in the administrative funds paid under this section to the State not later than the succeeding fiscal year: Provided, That such State shall receive startup funds in an amount to be determined by the Secretary to be necessary to enable the State to assume such responsibilities. Start-up funds shall be in addition to the administrative funds authorized by this section.

"(e) Notwithstanding any other provisions of law, for each fiscal year, the Secretary shall establish a date by which each State shall submit to the Secretary a plan for the disbursement of funds provided under this section for each such year, and the Secretary shall reallocate any unused funds, as evidenced by such plans, to other States as the Secretary deems appropriate.

"(f) The State may use a portion of the funds available under this section to assist in the administration of the commodity distribution program.

"(g) Each State shall each year submit to the Secretary for approval by a date to be established by the Secretary an annual plan for the use of State administrative expense funds, including a staff formula for State personnel, system level supervisory and operating personnel, and school level personnel.

"(h) Payments of funds under this Section shall be made only to States that agree to maintain a level of funding out of State revenues, for administrative costs in connection with programs under this Act not less than the amount expended or obligated in the preceding fiscal year.

"(i) If the Secretary finds that State has failed without good cause to meet one or more of the Secretary's standards established pursuant to this section, the Secretary shall withhold from such State sufficient funds authorized under this section as is reasonably necessary to induce compliance with the Secretary's standards on the State's administrative plan.

"(j) There shall be appropriated such sums as may be necessary for the purposes of this section.

"STATE PLAN REQUIREMENTS

EXPLANATION OF THE ACT

The National Child Nutrition Act of 1978 combines the National School Lunch Act (NSLA) and the Child Nutrition Act (CNA) into one National Child Nutrition Act. The following is a section-by-section description of the Act.

Section 2. Statement of Policy. This section pulls together the purpose clauses of § 2 of the NSLA, § 2 of the CNA, and § 4(g) of the CNA. It also adds a new phrase emphasizing the use of child nutrition programs in strengthening domestic agriculture programs through the use of commodities.

Section 3. Definitions. This section moves to the beginning of the Act definitions contained in § 12(d) of the NSLA and § 15 of the CNA. It deletes the definitions for "participation rate" and "Assistance Need Rate," as outdated and repetitive. This section also adds the Northern Marianas to the definition of "State," and a definition for the Consumer Price Index, including a provision for adjustment. The latter definition was added only to obviate the necessity of repeating the same language in several sections throughout the Act. Also defines Food Assistance Payment, National Average Basic Payment, Reduced-price Meal Payments, Free Meal Payment.

Section 4. Appropriations. This section provides that appropriations be made a year in advance of when they will be available for disbursement to States, and that funds unspent will remain available.

Section 5. School Meals Sections. This section combines §§ 4 and 11 of NSLA and § 4 of CNA, the school lunch and school breakfast provisions. The changes were made in order to establish a "school meals" program, recognizing the equal importance of both lunch and breakfast, and thereby developing a unified concept. Most changes are merely technical to accomplish this goal, or to delete out-of-date language such as references to special appropriations which have now expired.

Section 4 of NSLA establishes the lunch program, providing reimbursement for all meals served; § 11 provides for special assistance, in addition to basic payments, for free and reduced-price meals. Section 4 of CNA establishes the breakfast program.

(a)(1) combines the appropriations language of § 4 of NSLA and § 4(a) of CNA, and includes the current national average payment formula for payments to State agencies.

(a)(2) establishes the national average payment minimum rates for basic, free and reduced-price meals, using current reimbursement rates. This merely encompasses §§ 4 and 11(a) of NSLA and § 4(b) of CNA. All out-of-date language was removed from the relevant sections, i.e. FY 1973 allocations. This section adds a new provision authorizing adjustments in the national average payments for Alaska, Hawaii, etc. It is believed that this is necessary to more adequately reflect costs and circumstances in these areas.

(a)(3) refers to the maximum payments for free and reduced-price meals and reflects the language in § 11(b) of the NSLA with appropriate technical changes necessitated by a unified program.

(b)(1) and (b)(2) establish the especially needed concept for the school breakfast program, now contained in § 4(b) of CNA. The language is similar to that of P.L. 95–166.

(c) amends § 4(g) of CNA to require that the school breakfast program be implemented in all schools where a certain percentage of the children, the level not yet specified, are receiving free or reduced-price meals.

(d)(1) amends the language enacted by P.L. 95–166, found in § 11(a) of NSLA, which authorizes schools with a high percentage of children receiving free or reduced-price meals to receive reimbursement for 2 years on the basis of documentation filed the first year. This section is amended to reflect "school meals" and not just lunch.

(d)(2) repeats the language of § 11(e)(2) and (3), requiring the filing of reports on participation in the program. It adds reports on breakfast participation to the reporting requirements, which reflects current agency practice.

Section 6. School Food Service Equipment. Current law (§ 5 of CNA), reflecting the amendments of P.L. 95–166, authorizes $40 million for equipment assistance. Section 5 of NSLA has an authorization amount of $10 million, § 5 of CNA provides for allocation of funds for equipment to schools with poor economic conditions to purchase equipment necessary for storage, preparation, transportation and serving of food, and establishes a reserve of one-third of the funds for schools with no programs or without the facilities to prepare or receive hot meals.

Authorization is increased by $35 million to $75 million. This amount is to be distributed in three equal shares:

(1) ⅓ for no program schools,

(2) ⅓ for one program schools to assist in implementation of the second meal program,

(3) ⅓ for improvement of existing meal service facilities.

The "no-program funds" are to be allocated to a state on the basis of the ratio of the number of children in each state in schools without a food service program to the number of children in all states enrolled in such schools.

The "one-program" funds are to be allocated to a state on the basis of the ratio of the number of children in each state in schools with only one program to the number of children enrolled in such schools in all states.

Allocation of funds for improvement of existing meal service facilities are made on the basis of the ratio of the numbers of children in each state enrolled in schools to the number of children enrolled in all the states enrolled in schools.

In reallocations, the Secretary will be able to reallocate to states unused "no-program" funds, for use by them in expanding "one-program" schools. Any funds not utilized for either of these purposes will be able to be reallocated for the use of states in improvement of existing meal service facilities.

Section 7. Payments to States. Basically the same as current § 7 of NSLA, which establishes State matching requirements, and removes all outdated language, i.e. State matching percentages for 1972. We have deleted the last paragraph of this section relating to timing of payments for States, and moved it to § 21 of our draft, which provides that payments be made to States at such times as may be fixed by the Secretary.

Section 8. State Disbursements to Schools. This section, similar to § 8 of NSLA and § 4(c) of CNA, provides that State agencies make payments to schools in accordance with agreements between States and schools, and that funds be used for purchase of commodities and the cost of processing, distributing, transporting, storing and handling.

Section 9. Income Requirements. (a) This section amends § 9(b)(1) of the NSLA, which requires the Secretary to issue revised poverty guidelines each year and allows States to establish eligibility for receipt of free meals between 100 percent and 125 percent of the poverty line.

Changes include deletion of all out-dated language, simplification of language, and requires that all States establish eligibility for free meals at 125 percent of the poverty line. Two new provisions are added. The bill requires bi-lingual materials where there is a substantial population of non-English speaking families. It also allows a local school to provide free or reduce-price meals to children from families in situations of special hardships.

Section 10. Disbursement to Schools by the Secretary. This section provides for the Secretary to disburse money to private schools where the State is prohibited by law from doing so. The only change is to substitute the word "meals" for "lunch" to bring it into conformity. This section is the same as current law.

Section 11. Special Milk Program. Same as current law.

Section 12. Child Care Food Program. This section merely redesignates Section 17 of the NSLA as part of this bill.

Section 13. Supplemental Food Program for Women, Infants, and Children. This merely redesignates Section 17 of CNA as part of this bill.

Section 14. Summer Food Program. This redesignates Section 13 of NSLA as part of this bill.

Section 15. Nutritional Requirements. Current law [§ 9(a)] states that lunches served by schools participating in the school lunch program under this Act shall meet minimum nutritional requirements prescribed by the Secretary on the basis of tested nutritional research; except that such minimum nutritional requirements shall not be construed to prohibit the substitution of foods to accommodate this medical or other special dietary needs of individual students. Section 9 also specified certain meal service procedures.

The bill expands and elaborates upon the nutrition requirements in current law. It changes current language describing nutritional requirements by ("shall meet minimum nutritional requirements prescribed by the Secretary on the basis of tested nutritional research") significantly broadening factors to be considered in developing nutritional standards for the school meals program. It emphasizes: 1) acceptability and nutritional quality of the food; 2) the health-related aspects of food; 3) nutrition education as part of the meals program; 4) the importance of flexibility in the meal pattern; 5) improved training and technical assistance to food service personnel; 6) the necessity of parent and child input into menu planning and nutrition program operations; 7) guides for the improvement of the atmosphere of the eating place; and 8) the use of pilot project results in program improvement.

Section 16. Similar to current law § 6 NSLA, commodity purchase.

Section 17. Similar to current law § 14, commodity distribution.

Section 18. State Administrative Expense. (a) Current § 7 of CNA establishes payment for State administrative funds for the school meals and child care food programs equal to 1 percent through FY 1978, and up to 1½ percent for FY 1979 and 1980. As amended by P.L. 95–166, it also requires the Secretary to develop staffing patterns, annual State plans for use of such funds, and for reallocation of unused funds.

The amended section primarily affects § 7(a), and provides that a state will receive not less than 1 percent or more than 2 percent of program funds.

(b) and (c) are identical to current law.

(d) is similar to current subsection (d) which provides for appropriate adjustments in administrative funds when a State assumes responsibility for the program in non-profit schools. Added is a provision for start-up funds in such instances.

(e)–(h) is identical to current law.

(i) is new and permits the Secretary to withhold a portion of funds upon a State's failure to carry out the State's plan of child nutrition operations.

Section 19. State Plan Requirements. Currently set forth in § 11(e)(1) of NSLA, are requirements for each State to prepare plans of operations for the child nutrition programs, including detailed action plans to expand the programs to the maximum extent practicable for reaching needy children. Subsection (a) of the draft requires specific details in the plan for State action regarding outreach activities, compliance with the Secretary's staffing patterns, providing technical assistance and training, monitoring of local agency compliance, fair hearing procedures, and specific data collection. It also requires procedures allowing local schools, sponsors, and concerned citizens to have the opportunity to comment on the plan.

(b) also new, requires the Secretary to prepare guidance material to assist the States in preparing their plan.

The Department currently prepares what it considers guidance material. It merely restates the current regulations, i.e. requires a "detailed action plan" with no further specifics. Again, the Secretary must plan a meaningful role, and States must know clearly what is expected of them.

(c) is a new section which authorizes the Secretary to seek injunctive relief against a State for its failure to comply with the Act, or regulations, after notification and a time period for correction. This subsection is similar to the one passed in the recent food stamp amendments.

Section 20. Maintenance of Effort. Current § 17(g) of NSLA provides that expenditures from state and local sources not be reduced as a result of payments under the Section.

Sec. 21. National Advisory Council on Child Nutrition. This redesignates current Sec. 15, NSLA.

Sec. 22. Pilot Projects. This redesignates Sec. 20, NSLA.

Sec. 23. Nutrition Education and Training. This redesignates Sec. 19, CNA.

Sec. 24. Cash Grants for Nutrition Education. Similar to current Sec. 18, CNA, and provides some funds for Secretary to carry out research and development projects in this area.

Sec. 25. Regulations. Current Sec. 10 of CNA authorizes the Secretary to prescribe regulations necessary to carry out the Act.

The amendment requires regulations to be promulgated in accordance with the Administrative Procedure Act, and also simplifies the current language.

Sec. 26. Remedies. This new section prescribes remedies available if a state or local agency fails to comply with the statute or regulations. These remedies include: notification of lack of compliance, time to correct, upon failure to correct the withholding of appropriate funds to be put into escrow pending compliance, or as a last resort, authorization to seek injunctive relief. States have the right to seek review of the Secretary's actions.

Sec. 27. Payments to States. Same as Sec. 6, CNA.

Sec. 28. Reduction of Paperwork. Redesignates Sec. 21, NSLA.

Sec. 29. Prohibitions. Redesignates Sec. 11, CNA.

Sec. 30. Centralization of Administration. Redesignates Sec. 13, CNA.

Sec. 31. Federal Cost. Redesignates Sec. 14, CNA.

Sec. 32. Repeal. Provides for repeal of NSLA and CNA

Sec. 33. Effective Date. Establishes October 1, 1978 as effective date, and requires regulations to be effective within 90 days.●

By Mr. BARTLETT:

S. 2825. A bill to amend the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 with respect to certain charitable contributions; to the Committee on Finance.

● Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, on May 11, 1977, I introduced S. 1485 to alter the Internal Revenue Code in order to provide equal treatment to certain types of private foundations which are operating charitable programs. Under present tax law, a charitable organization is exempt from the private foundation rules if it is operated, supervised, or controlled by or in connection with another charitable organization, social welfare organization, civic league, labor union, or trade association. The intention of S. 1485 is to extend this exemption to charities operated, supervised or controlled by or in connection with a fraternal society.

This legislation is not new to the Senate or the House, and the matter has been taken up in hearings by both the House and the Senate. However, no action has been taken on the language in S. 1485, in part, because of the uncertainty as to its ultimate effect and the specific types of charities that might be allowed this exemption under the proposed language.

Because of this problem I am today introducing an alternative measure, which I believe clearly defines the type of facility which should be eligible for equal treatment under the foundation rules. The language which I am proposing states that the charity must have been operated or maintained with its own "* * * principal functional purpose: facilities for the long-term care, comfort, maintenance or education of permanently and totally disabled persons; elderly persons; needy widows; or children,".

This definite language should resolve the uncertainties which have previously existed in both my legislation and other bills that have been introduced in both the House and the Senate.

Mr. President, in order not to belabor the subject which I have previously discussed on May 11, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a statement made by Mr. S. Neal Johnson, trustee of the Sand Springs Home, before the House Ways and Means Committee on April 13, 1973.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF S. NEAL JOHNSON, TRUSTEE, SAND SPRINGS HOME, SAND SPRINGS, OKLA., ACCOMPANIED BY HON. CLEM ROGERS MCSPADDEN, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF OKLAHOMA, GEORGE D. WEBSTER, T. NEAL COMBS, AND JOHN R. MARCH, JR.

SUMMARY

1. Organizations such as the Sand Springs Home which provide care for orphans, children, widows and/or the aged should not be subjected to the restrictive provisions imposed by the Tax Reform Act of 1969.

2. The Sand Springs Home supports and urges the enactment of two bills which have been introduced by Mr. Brotzman:

(A) The first of these bills is H.R. 2258 which provides that organizations controlled by organizations described in sections 501(c)(8) and (19) [masonic and fraternal beneficiary associations] will qualify as other than private foundations.

(B) The other bill is H.R. 2259 which would provide that under certain circumstances, organizations providing for the long-term care, comfort, maintenance, or education of permanently and totally disabled residents, elderly persons, widows or children will qualify as other than private foundations.

Mr. JOHNSON. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I would like to introduce, on my far left, George Webster, an attorney here in Washington; Mr. John March, with the Arthur Young & Co., auditors for the Sand Springs Home, and has been for many years. On my immediate right is Mr. T. Neal Combs, who is an associate of Mr. Webster; and on my far right, and probably I should have introduced him first, a Representative from the great State of Oklahoma, my district, and I am happy to support him, Mr. Clem Rogers McSpadden, who is in Washington his first year. I am sure you will appreciate him more as time goes on, as we do in Oklahoma.

I have a prepared statement, Mr. Burke, which I sincerely hope will become a part of the record.

Mr. BURKE. The entire statement will be made part of the record. You may summarize if you wish.

Mr. JOHNSON. I would like to give you just a short history of the Sand Springs Home and the reason for its origin.

Mr. Charles Page, pioneer oilman in the State of Oklahoma, made a promise to his mother, who was a widow, that if the Lord ever made it possible for him to accumulate any of this world's goods, that he would devote his life and his fortune to help alleviate the suffering of widows and their children and needy, neglected orphans and children of broken homes.

The Sand Springs Home had its beginning on June 2, 1908. It was a small beginning. There was not even a town present there where Sand Springs, Okla., is now located. Mr. Page continued to explore the early oilfields of Oklahoma and, as he accumulated more money, he began to expand his charities, and thus the Sand Springs Home really came into being.

In 1912, August 9, the Sand Springs Home was incorporated under the bylaws of the State of Oklahoma. In the beginning, Mr. Page thought that he could operate the children's home and a Widows' Colony, or a widows' home, together. He saw the fallacy of this and in 1914 he established a Widows' Colony, which I believe is one of the most unique charitable operations in our country today.

Since the beginning of the Sand Springs Home, which Mr. Page personally endowed prior to the enactment of the 16th amendment—he did not do it to find any tax shelter, because there was no Federal income tax law on the books at that time—through the years of continuous operation, 65 years, there have been over 800 children raised and educated by the charitable policies of the Sand Springs Home.

In the Widows' Colony, which is a separate and distinct, different operation—and the Widows' Colony is governed by rules set forth by the Board of Trustees, of which I am a member—there have been 1,200 widows with approximately 3,000 children raised in the Widows' Colony.

So, through the years we have not necessarily invested our reserves or our money in stone and bricks; we have invested it in children and needy individuals who needed help.

What we have considered all through the years as a virtue, under the 1969 reform bill it seems to us is now a detriment, because we are not allowed by the bylaws of the Sand Springs Home to accept a contribution from anyone. There has never been one penny of government money—city, county, State, or Federal—that has ever gone into the operation. All moneys received by the children of the Sand Springs Home are placed under guardianship. That money is impounded, invested by their guardians. When they reach their majority, that money is turned over to them. It is never commingled with the funds of the Sand Springs Home.

The number of children presently in the home are 73. I think in the prepared statement you will find the number 68, but since this was prepared we have taken in a family of five children, the youngest of which is 3 months old.

We feel that we cannot be asked to continue to meet the requirements of section 4940 or for the distribution of our income when we have just in the past week taken on an obligation for which we are going to have to have funds for the next 18 years in order to carry out the wishes of Mr. Charles Page.

He set up and appointed, prior to his death, a five-man Board of Trustees because he realized that at his death he wanted men, honest men, men who would endeavor to the best of their ability to carry out this philanthropic work. He said prior to his death that "I will leave enough tangible assets if properly managed to perpetuate the Sand Springs Home from now on."

The one thing that bothered Mr. Page was how he was going to fill the vacancies on the Board of Trustees after his death. In 1925 he petitioned a society known as the Free and Accepted Masons of the State of Oklahoma, asking them to grant to the grand master of that society the authority and the power to fill the vacancies as they should occur.

This was done. The Masonic Order accepted the responsibility of filling the vacancies, and in 1956 I was appointed by the grand master of the Grand Lodge of Oklahoma as a member of the Board of Trustees. We have endeavored every day, and we are not the type of foundation that sits around and clips coupons, we are a working foundation. I am in my office at 7:30 in the morning, and I am at the beck and call of the children, the widows and their children, to help solve any problems they might have.

Our purpose in being here today is to ask this committee and Congress to classify the Sand Springs Home as something other than a private foundation. We strongly support and urge the passage of two bills which have been introduced by one of your colleagues, Representative Brotzman, because we feel with the passage of the legislation that the inequities we are now operating under would be changed entirely and we would be classified as a public foundation, which is the classification we feel we should have.

In the years we have been operating the Sand Springs Home we have educated doctors, lawyers, almost any profession you can think of, at the expense only of the Sand Springs Home. None of the children's money is ever spent. As long as they go to school they are at home in the Sand Springs Home. We furnish them with a high school education.

We send them to any 4-year-accredited college when their counselor says the child is capable of receiving an education, and we pay for it, all of it. We do not expect to be paid back in any number, shape, or form.

It has not been the policy of the home to carry out that type of educational program for the children of the widows' side. Where we have an outstanding child in the Widows' Colony, we make available to that child enough money to pay the tuition, scholarship, books, clothes, whatever it takes for that child to go to college. We lend them the money from our scholarship fund at no interest, and after they get out of college, start teaching or whatever their education prepares them to do, then they pay that money back.

We feel that we should not be asked to expend sums of money that are really just a waste. There is a time when you have to stop and consider, "Well, we could better use this money to help the elderly who have worked for the Sand Springs Home for many, many years," and we find that their social security checks are not enough to take care of them. So we supplement their security.

We are taking care of I don't know exactly how many at the present time, but it is about $1,800 a month that it costs us to supplement social security checks whereby our people and employees and relatives of Mr. Page can live in dignity.

This is why we think that we should be exempt from the 85 percent requirement under the Internal Revenue Code section 4942, and section 4940. Of course, if we were classified as a public foundation we would be exempt. We would not have to pay the 4 percent excise tax which has already taken from our funds over $50,000 since 1969 to pay that excise which we feel could have better been used because we have raised and educated and nurtured far more people than most any other home that I know of its kind.

For this reason, as I say, we support this legislation by Representative Brotzman. The Sand Springs Home has spent money to try to meet the requirements of the law as we are now classified. We have built a swimming pool at an expense of almost $6,000—a private swimming pool. We have built a brand new widows' colony in which we have invested over $400,000. We are building a summer recreational camp, rather a year-round recreational camp, on Grand Lake which will cost us over $300,000 by the time we are finished with it.

The widows' colony at the present time has 14 duplexes and there are 28 mothers with about 85 children living in the colony. We have let the contract just this past week for six new duplexes to expand our charity for the widows and their children.

We think that we are conforming to the letter of the law of what a charitable organition and charitable foundation should do, but because of the long term that we are expected to furnish funds and a home for these children and the widows, we do not feel that we should be called upon to expend a certain amount of money each year because, as most of you gentlemen know, sometimes there is a rainy day.

We have no objections to the 3-percent investment test. All we really and truly want is to be classified as a private operating foundation or a public foundation, because we do not just come down to the office and get our check and turn around and go back home. We work, the five men work at the job.

Mr. Chairman, I will be happy to answer any questions that any of you distinguished gentlemen might have. I will do the best I can, at least.

[The prepared statement follows:]

STATEMENT OF S. NEAL JOHNSON

Mr. Chairman and Members of the Committee: I am appearing on behalf of the Sand Springs Home, an orphanage in Sand Springs, Oklahoma. With me are George D. Webster and T. Neal Combs who are attorneys for the Home and John R. March, Jr., who is with Arthur Young & Company, auditors for the Home.

As a result of the Tax Reform Act of 1969, the Sand Springs Home is classified as a private foundation. The Home believes this was an unintended result. First, the Home submits that organizations such as the Sand Springs Home which are controlled by Masonic Orders should not be classified as private foundations but should be classified as other than private foundations. They should be accorded the same status as provided for charitable organizations which are controlled by labor unions, trade and professional groups, and social welfare organizations. Certainly, there could have been no intent in 1969 to discriminate against organizations controlled by Masonic and fraternal orders. The enactment of H.R. 2258 which would amend the last sentence of section 509(a) of the Internal Revenue Code to add language including organizations controlled by organizations described in section 501(c)(8) or (10) would achieve this result.

The Sand Springs Home further submits that in any event orphanages as well as homes for the aged and other charitable organizations providing for long-term care of individuals should not be treated as private foundations but should be specifically excluded from such treatment and relieved of the section 4940 taxes and the distribution requirements of section 4942 of the Internal Revenue Code. This would place them in the same position as colleges, schools and hospitals which also provide basic charitable services to the public and which are not required to meet a test of support by the public. This can be accomplished by the enacting of H.R. 2259.

HISTORY OF THE SAND SPRINGS HOME

The Sand Springs Home was founded by one Charles Page on June 2, 1908. On August 9, 1912, it was incorporated under the laws of the State of Oklahoma. At the time the Home was founded there was no federal income tax since a federal income tax could not be imposed until 1913 after the passage of the Sixteenth Amendment. The Home was originally formed for the purpose of caring for orphans, however in 1914 recognizing that there was a need for a facility which would provide a place for widows to raise their children, there was formed a Widows' Colony. These activities have continued until the present time. At the present time the Home has 68 dependent children in the Home and in the Widows' Colony there are 28 widows with a total of 75 children.

The Sand Springs Home since its formation has expended in excess of $20 million for charitable and philanthropic purposes and has cared for a total of 800 dependent children, for whom the Home has provided all necessities of life, and more than twice this number of children and widows. Thus, there can be no doubt that it is carrying out its charitable purposes. The Home is unique since Mr. Page, recognizing the need for such organizations at an early date, provided the organization with an endowment which has resulted in its never having to request that the public make contributions to it. The Home has been able to operate without having to further burden the public with requests for funds. However, what would be considered a virtue is now a detriment since if the Home had requested additional funds through the years from the public for its support, it would undoubtedly be able to qualify as a public foundation. However, leaving the funds of the community available to be used for other charitable activities, the Home now finds itself in the position of being classified as a private foundation.

ADDITIONAL INFORMATION CONCERNING THE HOME

Children are committed to the Home by the order of the Oklahoma State District Court which charges the Home with the duty of the care, maintenance and education of the children. Widows and their children are admitted to the Widows' Colony under rules and regulations authorized by the Sand Springs Home, but the children remain under the jurisdiction of their mothers.

Personal assets of children are held in trust under guardianships established under the Probate Division of the District Court of Tulsa County, Oklahoma. Individual bonded guardians are appointed by the Court, and all personal assets, including Social Security, Veteran's benefits, etc., are impounded in the duly established guardianships which are administered under the watchful eye of the above-mentioned Court until its approval of the final distribution by the guardian of assets, and all increments accruing thereto, to said child on reaching his or her majority. No personal funds of any child are ever accepted into or co-mingled with the accounts of the Sand Springs Home. The Home's Legal Department protects each child in effecting settlement of claims for death, insurance, Social Security and Veteran's benefits from which such guardianship assets customarily accrue.

The Home makes available to the Public School System of Sand Springs and to the various churches of Sand Springs and immediate area, lands belonging to it, as long as such lands are occupied and used for educational or religious purposes as the case may be.

The Home's assets consist, in addition to the land and buildings directly utilized for the carrying out of the exempt activities, of large tracts of land which are increasing in value, as Tulsa, Oklahoma expands, stock in several small but prosperous wholly-owned companies (e.g., the Sand Springs Railroad Company), oil properties, and investments in governmental obligations and certificates of deposit. It is difficult to assess the total value of the assets (this being one of the problems presented by the Tax Reform Act), however the total endowment is substantial and at a minimum this value exceeds $12,000,000.

The trustees of the Home are appointed by the Oklahoma Grand Master of the fraternal society known as the Ancient Free and Accepted Masons which is a section 501(c)(8) organization.

PROBLEMS OF THE SAND SPRINGS HOME UNDER SECTIONS 4940 AND 4942

The Home has paid total taxes as required by section 4940 of $50,000. These funds have, of course, thus been diverted from charitable use and have not been available for use by the Home for the benefit of dependent children and widows and their children. It is submitted that the Home should not be forced to pay the tax but should be accorded the same treatment as colleges and hospitals receive.

The Home is also experiencing severe problems with respect to the minimum distribution requirement of section 4942 of the Code. While section 4942 is not a great problem to grant-making organizations which simply spend more in the form of grants to meet the distribution requirement, the Sand Springs Home and other such organizations which must meet obligations of long-term care, and have already invested considerable sums in the assets used to carry out their charitable purposes, are experiencing problems with the requirements of section 4942. These organizations, with their continuing obligations, must be careful that over spending now does not prevent them from meeting their continuing obligations to the residents of their facilities. However, not only are the general distribution requirements of section 4942 of the Code causing problems for this type organization, but they also have difficulty meeting the private operating foundation requirements of section 4942. In order to qualify as a private operating foundation, an organization must normally expend directly for its operating purposes an amount equal to 85% of its adjusted net income and an amount equal to not less than two-thirds of its minimum investment return. It is the second requirement, known as the "endowment test" which provides problems for the Sand Springs Home and many similarly situated homes.

The Sand Springs Home must be in a position to hold assets which will appreciate in value to insure that it will be able to meet the continuing responsibility to the children and widows for whom it has accepted responsibility. This is, of course, even more important with the current inflationay trends. The Home must be in a position to invest for the future as well as for current income. Of course, some could argue that the Home could simply increase its expenditure per widow or child. However, there are, of course, limits to the providing of support and the Home should not be forced to engage in wasteful, needless spending to meet an artificial requirement of the tax laws.

Profligate spending will only serve to prevent the Home from meeting its long-term charitable responsibilities. Also, it should be remembered that the Home already has its substantial investment in facilities and it is not feasible continuously to simply rebuild the Home.

SOLUTIONS TO THE PROBLEM: H.R. 2258

First, there is H.R. 2258 which would amend the last sentence of section 500(a) to provide:

"For purposes of paragraph (3), an organization described in paragraph (2) shall be deemed to include an organization described in section 501(c) (4), (5) or (6) or an organization incorporated before June 1, 1939 and described in section 501(c) (8) or (10) which would be described in paragraph (2) if it were an organization described in section 501(c)(3)."

The new language refers to sections 501(c) (8) and 501(c)(10). The importance of this to the Sand Springs Home is that since its trustees are appointed by the Grand Master of Masons in Oklahoma, which is exempt under section 501(c)(8) and which could meet the requirement of section 509(a)(2) if they were exempt under section 501(c)(3), the Home, if H.R. 2258 is enacted, will be other than a private foundation. It is submitted that the grandfather features of the bill should be eliminated since regardless of when formed an organization controlled by an organization described in section 501(c) (8) or (10) should be treated as other than a private foundation.

During the passage of the Tax Reform Act of 1969, there was considerable attention directed by the American Bar Foundation, the American Society of Association Executives, labor unions and the Chamber of Commerce of the United States to foundations which received most of their support from or were controlled by labor unions or business or professional associations (such as the American Bar Association) and that would have otherwise been classified as private foundations under the initial proposed definition of private foundations. The House version was amended accordingly by the Senate and this was finally adopted as a part of the Internal Revenue Code to provide that organizations that were controlled or operated in connection with designated organizations would not be classified a private foundations. If it were not for the last paragraph of section 509(a), a foundation which received all of its funds from the International Ladies Garment Workers Union, or the trustees of which were appointed by the Chamber of Commerce of the U.S., for instance, would be classified as a private foundation.

It is this paragraph of section 509(a)(3) that is proposed to be amended. The purpose of this proposed amendment is to provide that the same treatment shall be extended to organizations controlled by organizations described in sections 501(c)(8) and 501(c)(10). There is no reason for organizations, the governing bodies of which are appointed by the Masons, and other similar organizations such as Knights of Columbus, not to be extended the same treatment as organizations, the governing bodies of which are appointed by unions or trade associations, since the control is in a "public" organization. In the case of the Sand Springs Home, where trustees are appointed by the Grand Master of Oklahoma Masons, it is clear that the control is a public organization.

It is submitted that H.R. 2258 should be enacted since undoubtedly it was only because of oversight that this provision was not placed in the Internal Revenue Code in 1969 at the time similar language was added providing such treatment for organizations controlled by trade associations and labor unions.

H.R. 2259

H.R. 2259 also should be enacted. It is very meritorious. It provides that organizations such as the Sand Springs Home formed before October 31, 1969 which expend an amount equal to 3% of the net fair market value of their assets, as defined in section 4942(e)(1)(A), would not be classified as private foundations. This language was introduced in the last Congress and was known as the "Allott Bill." It has been introduced this session by Congressman Brotzman and is cosponsored by Congressmen Armstrong, Burleson and Conable. It is submitted that this legislation should be enacted. The fact that the Home's endowment has come from one individual should not prevent its being classified as other than a private foundation since there are other sections of the Internal Revenue Code which permit organizations to be classified as other than private foundations even though the endowment has been supplied by a limited number of persons. Examples of this are medical research organizations as well as universities and schools which are classified under sections 170(b)(1)(A) (ii) and (iii) of the Internal Revenue Code and by virtue of section 509(a)(1) as public organizations. Therefore, there is ample precedent for the treatment requested.

MANY ORGANIZATIONS ARE EXEMPT FROM PRIVATE STATUS DUE TO THE FUNCTION WHICH THEY SERVE

Churches, schools, hospitals and units of government are types of organizations which are treated as other than private foundations because of the function they perform or the benefits they confer on society. Certainly, organizations which operate facilities for the long-term care of children, widows and elderly persons should be accorded the same status as these organizations.

Another factor should also be considered. There are numerous other homes for children and the elderly in the United States, which are operated or sponsored by churches, fraternal organizations and labor organizations. These organizations already are relieved of the private foundation requirements. It is submitted that the Sand Springs Home and other organizations which have been privately endowed and which care for children and the elderly should not be treated differently and should be relieved of the requirements imposed on private foundations, including the 4% annual excise tax on net investment income imposed by section 4940 of the Code.

We refer you to testimony presented on April 10, 1973, by Karl L. Ross, President of the Myron Stratton Home in Colorado Springs, Colorado, wherein information was given concerning the number of homes affected.

There is now pending in this Committee a bill, H.R. 2259, sponsored by Congressmen Armstrong, Burleson and Conable which is substantially identical to bills introduced in previous sessions. This bill will provide the relief which is sought. It amends section 170(b)(1)(A)(iii) of the Code (the clause relating to hospitals and medical research organizations) to include organizations which operate and maintain as their principal purpose or function facilities for the long-term care, comfort, maintenance or education of resident permanently and totally disabled persons, elderly persons, needy widows and children and which expend annually for such purposes an amount equal to not less than 3% of the value of their investment assets.

The Brotzman bill seeks to afford to organizations which operate facilities for the long-term care of the elderly and children the same status as is now accorded to hospitals and medical research organizations, except for the added requirement that annual expenditures for operation of the facilities must equal or exceed an amount equal to 3% of endowment. If enacted, the Brotzman bill would exempt such organizations from the 4% annual excise tax on net investment income and permit the funds otherwise payable as taxes to be devoted to care of residents. The bill would also eliminate the uncertainties associated with qualification of such organizations as operating foundations under section 4942 of the Code.

CONCLUSION

In summary the Committee is respectfully requested to consider both H.R. 2258 and H.R. 2259 and to act favorably on both of these meritorious bills.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. President, the Sand Springs Home is a charitable operation of the Oklahoma Masons, and provides services for orphans and widows. Mr. Johnson's statement clearly describes the effect of the unequal treatment on these fraternal charitable organizations, and, I believe, is representative of other similarly controlled charities in other States.

Mr. President, I also ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD a partial list of charities which would be similarly affected by the change which I am proposing.

Mr. President, the number of fraternally operated charities which would come under this definition is not large, and this change represents a significant benefit to each of these charities in that they will annually have additional funds to spend on the children or widows that reside with them.

There being no objection, the list was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

By Mr. McCLURE:

S. 2826. A bill to establish water resources research centers, to promote a more adequate national program of water research, and for other purposes; to the Committee on Environment and Public Works.

WATER RESOURCES RESEARCH ACT OF 1978

● Mr. McCLURE. Mr. President, I am introducing a bill today that amends the Water Resources Research Act of 1964 to provide additional authorization for the water research institutes as well as change some of the provisions of the act to allow for a more varied use of funds in the institutes and private sector.

The 1978 act was written and recommended by the Water Committee of the National Association of State Universities and Land-Grant Colleges in consultation with members of the water research institutes. It differs from S. 2704, the administration bill to increase authorizations for the program and should be considered at the hearings on Friday, April 7 in the Public Works Committee on water resources research.

The first change from the original act is in the allotment program. The current act is authorized at $250,000 and each institute has been allocated $110,000 per year. This bill will increase each State institute allotment portion to $150,000 and an additional $100,000 would be granted for approved programs meeting special research needs in that region. The basic allotment per institute enables them to maintain, on a continuing basis, a minimal type of research, technology transfer, and training function on which to build a Federal-State partnership. The additional funds meet unique needs the different institutes may have and recognizes that water- and land-related problems are not uniform throughout the country. These additional funds are also contingent on the States providing one non-Federal dollar for every two Federal dollars to the program.

The next major change increases the authorization for matching funds to $10 million. These funds are to be used primarily to address regional problems. Problems may range from contiguous States having rivers forming boundaries and causing impacts on each State and States sharing common problems on water quality such as mining activities. The magnitude of these problems is the reason for increasing this authorization.

The authorization for title II remains at $10 million. This section is concerned with problems which can utilize both the expertise of the universities and the private sector. The program would be coordinated through OWRT and thus permit national issues to be addressed.

The last change is concerned with technology transfer. The institutes are designed to bring information to the users in a particular State or region irrespective of the sources of that information; $75,000 would be provided to each institute for this purpose and an additional $50,000 is authorized for institutes that meet certain qualifications.

This legislation should be seriously considered in our efforts to revise and improve our very important water research programs in this country.

I ask unanimous consent that the bill be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the bill was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

S. 2826

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, "that the Water Resources Research Act of 1964 (P.L. 88-379, 78 Stat. 329; 42 U.S.C. 1961 et seq.), as amended is amended to read as follows:

"(a) This Act may be cited as the 'Water Resources Research Act of 1978.'

"(b) In order to assist in assuring the Nation at all times of a supply of water sufficient in quantity and quality to meet the requirements of its expanding population, it is the purpose of the Congress, by this Act, to create a nationwide capability, including a network of state institutes, which will provide a state and regional and national focus for resolving water and related land problems through the stimulation and sponsorship of research, investigations, experimentations, and demonstrations; dissemination of data and research results to all users including the general public; and the training of scientists in disciplinary and interdisciplinary fields which affect the water resources.

"TITLE I—STATE WATER RESOURCES RESEARCH INSTITUTES

"SEC. 100. (a) There are authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of the Interior for the fiscal year 1979 and each subsequent year thereafter sums adequate to provide $150,000 each year to assist each participating State in establishing and carrying on the work of a competent and qualified water resources research institute, center, or equivalent agency (hereinafter referred to as 'institute') at one college or university in that State, which college or university shall be a college or university established in accordance with the Act approved July 2, 1862 (12 Stat. 503), entitled 'An Act donating public lands to the several States and territories which may provide colleges for the benefit of agriculture and the mechanical arts' or some other institution designated by Act of the legislature of the State concerned: Provided, That (1) if there is more than one such college or university in a State, established in accordance with said Act of July 2, 1862, funds under this Act shall, in the absence of a designation to the contrary by act of the legislature of the State, be paid to the one such college or university designated by the Governor of the State to receive the same subject to the Secretary's determination that such college or university has, or may reasonably be expected to have, the capability of doing effective work under this Act; (2) the designated State institute shall cooperate closely with other colleges and universities in the State with demonstrated research, information dissemination, and graduate training capabilities in developing a statewide program directed to resolving state and regional water and land related problems; (3) two or more States may cooperate in the designation of a single interstate or regional institute, in which event the sums assignable to all of the cooperating States shall be paid to such institute; (4) the designated State institute shall cooperate closely with regional consortia, as may be designated by the Secretary, to increase the effectiveness of the nationwide network of institutes and for the purpose of regional coordination, particularly with regional river basin commissions and other interagency river basin organizations as may be established by Congress; and (5) a designated college or university may, as authorized by appropriate State authority, arrange with other colleges and universities within the State to participate in the work of the institute: Provided further, That for fiscal year 1979 not more than $125,000 shall be appropriated for each of the District of Columbia, the Virgin Islands, Puerto Rico, and Guam, and for fiscal year 1980 not more than $150,000 shall be appropriated for each of such areas.

"(b) There shall be authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of the Interior for fiscal year 1979 and each year thereafter sums adequate to provide an additional $100,000 to each State institute to support water resources research in the institutes provided these funds are approved only for specific projects and only if the institute has shown to the satisfaction of the Secretary that it has developed a comprehensive research plan focused on water problems of high priority and of importance to more than one State in its region and provided further that the institute shows that the research projects supported have at least $1 of non-Federal contribution for each $2 of Federal support under this section.

"(c) It shall be the duty of each such institute to plan and conduct and/or arrange for a component or components of the college or university with which it is affiliated or with other qualified colleges or universities in the State to conduct competent research, investigations, and experiments of either a basic or practical nature, or both, in relation to water resources and to provide for the training of scientists through such research, investigations, and experiments. Such research, investigations, experiments, and training may include, without being limited to, aspects of the hydrologic cycle; supply and demand for water; conservation and best use of available supplies of water; methods of increasing such supplies; and economic, legal, social, engineering, recreational, biological, geographic, ecological, and other aspects of water problems; having due regard to the varying conditions and needs of the respective States and regions, to water research projects being conducted by agencies of the Federal and State Governments, the agricultural experiment stations, other university research centers, and others, and to avoidance of any undue displacement of scientists and engineers elsewhere engaged in water resources research. The annual programs submitted by the State institutes to the Secretary for approval shall include assurance satisfactory to the Secretary that such programs were developed in close consultation and collaboration with leading water resources officials within the State and region to promote research, information dissemination, training, and other work meeting the needs of the State.

"SEC. 101. (a) There is further authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of the Interior for the fiscal year 1979 and each year thereafter sums adequate to provide to each State institute a minimum of $75,000 and no more than $125,000 for the purpose of organizing and carrying out an approved program of technology transfer and/or information dissemination so that the results of research are put into practical use at the earliest feasible time, and provided further that the institute shows that the technology transfer and/or information dissemination program have at least $1 of non-Federal contribution for each $2 of Federal support under this section. This technology transfer program must comprise a comprehensive plan to provide scientific information dissemination activities, such as identifying, assembling, and interpreting the results of scientific and engineering research deemed potentially significant for solution of water resource problems, providing means for improved communication regarding such research results, including prototype operations, ascertaining the existing and potential effectiveness of such for aiding in the solution of practical problems, and for training qualified persons in the performance of such scientific information dissemination.

"SEC. 102. (a) There is further authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of the Interior for the fiscal year 1979 and each subsequent year thereafter sums not in excess of $10,000,000. Such moneys when appropriated, shall be available to match, on a dollar-for-dollar basis, funds made available to institutes by States or other non-Federal sources to meet the necessary expenses of specific water resources research and information dissemination projects which are of high priority to one or more States in the region or which have national significance and which could not otherwise be undertaken, including the expenses of planning and coordinating regional water resources research projects by two or more institutes. Such high priority projects shall be identified by the Secretary of the Interior in consultation and collaboration with the institutes, including regional institute consortia as designated by the Secretary.

"(b) Each application for a grant pursuant to subsection (a) of this section shall, among other things, state the nature of the project to be undertaken, the period during which it will be pursued, the qualifications of the personnel who will direct and conduct it, the importance of the project to the water economy of the Nation, the region, and the State concerned, its relation to other known research projects theretofore pursued or currently being pursued, the extent to which potential users of the research findings have been involved in formulation of the research plans and method for user involvement during the study period, and the extent to which it will provide opportunity for the training of water resources scientists. No grant shall be made under said subsection (a) except for a project approved by the Secretary, and all grants shall be made upon the basis of the merit of the project, the need for the knowledge which it is expected to produce when completed, and the opportunity it provides for the training of water resources scientists.

"SEC. 103. Sums available to the States under the terms of sections 100, 101 and 102 of this Act shall be paid to their designated institutes at such times and in such amounts during each fiscal year as determined by the Secretary, and upon vouchers approved by him. Funds received by an institute pursuant to such payment may be used for any allowable costs within the meaning of the Federal procurement regulations that establish principles for determining costs applicable to research and development under grants and contracts with educational institutions (41 CFR 1–15.3), including future amendments thereto: Provided, That the direct costs of the programs of each State institute, as distinguished from indirect costs, are not less than the amount of the Federal funds made available to such State institute pursuant to section 100 of this Act. Each institute shall have an officer appointed by its governing authority who shall receive and account for all funds paid under the provisions of this Act and shall make an annual report to the Secretary on or before the 1st day of December of each year, on the total program of the institute in research; technology transfer and information dissemination and training toward the resolving of water and land related problems of each State and region during the preceding fiscal year, and of its disbursement, on schedules prescribed by the Secretary. If any of the moneys received by the authorized receiving officer of any institute under the provisions of this Act shall by any action or contingency be found by the Secretary to have been improperly diminished, lost, or misapplied, it shall be replaced by the State concerned and until so replaced no subsequent appropriation shall be allotted or paid to any institute of such State.

"SEC. 104. Moneys appropriated pursuant to this Act, in addition to being available for expenses for research, investigations, experiments, demonstrations, technology transfer, and training conducted under authority of this Act, shall also be available for printing and publishing the results thereof and for administrative planning and direction. The institutes are hereby authorized and encouraged to plan and conduct programs financed under this Act in cooperation with each other, with other colleges and universities and with such other agencies and individuals as may contribute to the solution of the water and related land problems involved, and moneys appropriated pursuant to this Act shall be available for paying the necessary expenses of planning, coordinating, and conducting such cooperative research and information dissemination.

"SEC. 105. The Secretary of the Interior is hereby charged with the responsibility for the proper administration of this Act and, after full consultation with other interested Federal agencies, shall prescribe such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out its provisions. He shall require a showing that institutes designated to receive funds have, or may reasonably be expected to have, the capability of developing a comprehensive program of research, information dissemination, and training designed to resolve water and land related problems in a timely manner. He shall furnish such advice and assistance as will best promote the purposes of this Act, participate in coordinating research initiated under this Act by the institutes, indicate to them such lines of inquiry as to him seem most important, and encourage and assist in the establishment and maintenance of cooperation by and between the institutes and between them and other research organizations, the United States Department of the Interior, and other Federal establishments.

"SEC. 106. On or before the 1st day of October in each year after the passage of this Act, the Secretary shall ascertain whether the requirements of section 103 have been met as to each State, whether it is entitled to receive its share of the annual appropriations for water resources research, information dissemination, and training under sections 100, 101, and 102 of this Act, and the amount which it is entitled to receive.

"SEC. 107. Nothing in this Act shall be construed to impair or modify the legal relation existing between any of the colleges or universities under whose direction an institute is established and the government of the State in which it is located, and nothing in this Act shall in any way be construed to authorize Federal control or direction of education at any college or university.

"TITLE II—ADDITIONAL WATER RESOURCES RESEARCH PROGRAMS

"SEC. 200. (a) There are authorized to be appropriated to the Secretary of the Interior $10,000,000 for the fiscal year 1979 and for each of the fiscal years 1980–88 inclusive, from which appropriations the Secretary may make grants to and finance contracts and matching or other arrangements with educational institutions, private foundations or other institutions, with private firms and individuals whose training, experience, and qualifications are, in his judgment, adequate for the conduct of water research projects, and with local, State, and Federal Government agencies, to undertake research into any aspects of water and related land problems which are of a national interest and which are not otherwise being studied.

"(b) In addition to other requirements of this Act, the Secretary's annual report to the President and Congress as required by section 307 of this Act shall indicate in a comprehensive manner the contribution made to resolving water and land related problems of a national interest by contract and grant award approved under subsection (a) of this section.

"TITLE III—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

"SEC. 300. The Secretary of the Interior shall obtain the continuing advice and cooperation of all agencies of the Federal Government concerned with water problems, of State and local governments, and of private institutions and individuals, to assure that the programs authorized in this Act will supplement and not duplicate established water research programs, to stimulate research in otherwise neglected areas, and to contribute to a comprehensive, nationwide program of water and related resources research. He shall make generally available information and reports on projects completed, in progress, or planned under the provisions of this Act, in addition to any direct publication of information by the institutes themselves.

"SEC. 301. Nothing in this Act is intended to give or shall be construed as giving the Secretary of the Interior any authority or surveillance over water resources research conducted by any other agency of the Federal Government, or as repealing, superseding, or diminishing existing authorities or responsibilities of any agency of the Federal Government to plan and conduct, contract for, or assist in research in its areas of responsibility and concern with water resources.

"SEC. 302. Contracts or other arrangements for water resources work authorized under this Act with an institute, educational institution, or non-profit organization may be undertaken without regard to the provisions of section 3684 of the Revised Statutes (31 U.S.C. 529) when, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior, advance payments of initial expense are necessary to facilitate such work.

"SEC. 303. No part of any appropriated funds may be expended pursuant to authorization given by this Act for any scientific or technological research or development activity unless such expenditure is conditioned upon provisions determined by the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the Attorney General, to be effective to insure that all information, uses, products, processes, patents, and other developments resulting from that activity will (with such exceptions and limitations as the Secretary may determine, after consultation with the Secretary of Defense, to be necessary in the interest of the national defense) be made freely and fully available to the general public. Nothing contained in this section shall deprive the owner of any background patent relating to any such activity of any rights which that owner may have under that patent.

"SEC. 304. There shall be established, in such agency and location as the President determines to be desirable, a center for cataloging current and projected scientific research in all fields of water resources. Each Federal agency doing water resources research shall submit quarterly to such cataloging center information on research underway, scheduled, and completed. The cataloging center shall classify and maintain for general use a printed catalog and computer information search system of water resources research and investigation projects in progress or scheduled by all Federal agencies. The cataloging center shall also establish a program to facilitate and encourage non-Federal agencies of government, colleges, universities, private institutions, firms, and individuals as to voluntarily make similar information available concerning in-house research and research supported by grants and contracts on a systematic basis.

"SEC. 305. The President shall, by such means as he deems appropriate, clarify agency responsibilities for Federal water resources research and provide interagency coordination of such research, including the research authorized by this Act. Such coordination shall include (a) continuing review of the adequacy of the Government-wide program in water resources research, (b) identification and elimination of duplication and overlaps between two or more agency programs, (c) identification of technical needs in various water resources research categories, (d) recommendations with respect to allocation of technical effort among the Federal agencies, (e) review of technical manpower needs and findings concerning the technical manpower base of the program, (f) recommendations concerning management policies to improve the quality of the Government-wide research effort, and (g) actions to facilitate interagency communication at management levels. The President shall submit to Congress on December 1 of each year a report on the progress being made to effectuate the coordinating function described in this section and the need for legislation to implement the objectives of this section.

"SEC. 306. As used in this Act, the term 'State' includes the Commonwealth of Puerto Rico, the District of Columbia, and the territories of the Virgin Islands and Guam.

"SEC. 307. The Secretary shall make a report to the President and Congress on or before February 1 of each year on contributions which the total institute program (sections 100, 101, and 102) has made toward resolving water and related land problems during the preceding fiscal year. The report shall also include a detailed statement of the water and related land problems to be given priority attention during the next fiscal year. This statement shall be developed in consultation and collaboration with the network of State institutes.

"SEC. 308. Excess personal property acquired by the Secretary under the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act of 1949, as amended, for use in furtherance of the purposes of this Act may be conveyed by the Secretary to a cooperating institute, educational institution, or nonprofit organization, with or without consideration, under such terms and conditions as the Secretary may prescribe." ●

Whereas it is the policy of the United States to guarantee to every citizen the right to fair housing; and

Whereas this right and the responsibilities attendant on it are set forth in the National Fair Housing Law, Title VIII of the 1968 Civil Rights Act; and

Whereas, during the decade that has elapsed since 1968 the Month of April has been set aside each year for commemoration of the Fair Housing Law; now, therefore, be it

Resolved, that the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring) recognizes the month of April as Fair Housing Month and that the Congress of the United States hereby rededicates itself to the promulgation and practice of the letter and spirit of the Fair Housing Law so that fair housing will become a right that can be realized by every American.

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, April marks the 10th anniversary of the enactment of the Fair Housing Law, known as title VIII of the Civil Rights Act of 1968.

The resolution I am submitting today on behalf of several of my colleagues designates the month of April as "Fair Housing Month" and recommits the Congress to the goals of the Civil Rights Act of 1968. My Maryland colleague, Representative PARREN MITCHELL, is introducing a companion resolution today in the House.

Title VIII specifically prohibits discrimination in the sale or rental of housing because of race, color, religion, national origin, or sex. Over 80 percent of the Nation's housing is subject to the Fair Housing Law, while the remainder is covered by the Civil Rights Act of 1866 with respect to racial discrimination.

Over the past 10 years, title VIII has served as the Federal "big stick" behind local efforts of committed open housing advocates. These joint national and local efforts have helped eradicate such blatantly discriminatory practices as racial steering, dual housing markets, redlining, discriminatory zoning, and cross burnings on front lawns. We have them to thank for the elimination of "white only" policies in advertising, rental applications, and the use of racial stereotype models in housing advertisements.

But we still have a way to go. While the more blatant forms of racial discrimination have subsided, racially discriminatory practices still exist. A report prepared for HUD by the National Committee Against Discrimination in Housing (NCDH) found that discrimination by race is still occurring in the Nation's real estate markets. I ask unanimous consent that an article from Trends in Housing on NCDH's findings be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXAMPLES OF DISCRIMINATION CITED BY TESTERS

(NOTE.—Housing discrimination takes many forms. Quite often the black homeseeker is unaware that discrimination has occurred. Auditors in the survey were asked to write a narrative report giving their impression of the audit, if they wished to do so. Narratives usually were written only when something unusual had occurred. However, the narratives, combined with the facts in the survey documents, point out some forms of discrimination which the average homeseeker may not notice. Below are some examples of discrimination which occurred during the survey. They are not necessarily typical of the auditors' experiences in the areas surveyed.)

In Oklahoma City, the black auditor was very impressed with the kindness and courtesy of the agent. "She seemed unbothered about showing me houses where no blacks apparently live," the auditor reported. However, the auditor didn't realize that although the down payment mentioned to her for a particular house was 20 percent of the purchase price, the white auditor was told it was 10 percent. In the same city, a black auditor was greeted by a secretary in a real estate office. As the secretary was showing the auditor the listing book, the agent arrived. He apparently panicked. He did show the black auditor one house, but said the other house wouldn't be ready for inspection for an hour. He arranged to meet the auditor at the real estate office; however, when she arrived, she was told he'd gone to the house. She drove to the house but there was no agent, and a "sold" sign appeared in the front yard. And the agent had never asked her name or given his.

And another black auditor in Oklahoma City twice found doors locked at a small realty company. Non unusual—but in her words, "I waited 10 minutes, I believe. Before I could get out of the driveway the shades went up."

In Nassau County, New York, the black auditor reported she was told "no agent was available, two other people at desks were not salespersons, one at funeral, another sick, and he couldn't leave the office." He didn't ask her to sit down, and suggested she look in another neighborhood which is 60 percent black.

In Westbury, New York, the agent got a computer printout of the multiple listings for the white auditor, but not for the black one. He took the black auditor to see a house, which he then claimed he couldn't find. The white auditor reported that the "agent asked if I knew this was an integrated area . . . said the areas he was showing me had some blacks but he couldn't tell their houses from the others . . . said Westbury School System wasn't as good as East Meadow because it had so many blacks."

One black auditor was only shown one house because the salesman said he had just returned from vacation and didn't know what was available. A black auditor was kept waiting for an hour before being shown unsuitable houses. She was also asked if her husband was going to live with her. A white auditor reported that when a white agent was late for an appointment, the agent explained that the previous day had been hectic. "She said she had had one black person waiting for her when she opened the office, and three telephone calls during the day from 'black people' she could tell by their voices. She has to be very careful because they could be from the state department or civil rights group." Her caution was wasted. The black person waiting for her was indeed an auditor, and the agent did clearly discriminate. (She could only find two houses to show her, she kept her waiting, and she didn't show her the homes in white neighborhoods that she showed to the white auditor.)

One agent had the black auditor follow her in his own car, because she didn't want to be seen showing a home to a black in a white ethnic neighborhood. That was after telling him at great length about a black family that got bombed when they moved into that neighborhood.

The price of a house in Rye City, New York, was $83,000 to the white auditor on June 13, and $87,000 to the black auditor on June 16. Same agent. One black auditor had a white broker say to a salesman, "I won't let her go into one of those prejudiced neighborhoods (Bronxville, N.Y.); near me in East Mt. Vernon is a lovely Tudor house just right for her."

An agent in Riverside, California, in the same area showed both the black and white auditors the same house—but the black auditor was told the down payment was 20 percent, while the white was told it was 10 percent.

In Savannah, Georgia, a white auditor was told by an agent, "This area is not all, shall we say, caucasian." She also told her she wouldn't want to live in the downtown area because she would have to buy burglar bars.

In Saginaw, Michigan, the price of a house went up by $7,600 when it was shown to the black auditor. On June 22 at 3:15 p.m., it was $41,900 (to the white auditor) and on June 23 at 10:15 a.m., it was $49,500 (to the black auditor). It was the same agent.

A white auditor was asked if he was married to a black woman, since he had requested to look at homes in an integrated neighborhood.

In one real estate office in Saginaw Township, the black auditor got no response from the agent. The secretary was told to tell the auditor that the company handled only commercial and industrial real estate. However, the white auditor was asked to be seated, offered a business card and asked questions about the kind of home she wished to purchase. The agent offered to obtain financing for her, and even picked her up the next day so they could look at homes together. She was shown three homes, all in her price range with good financing available. One white auditor reported that the agent "said I must have been from out of town to be requesting 'East Side' housing! . . . said it was 'against the law' for her to make references to 'mixed neighborhoods' but thought I'd better know first—she didn't want me to be walking in 'cold' and then coming down on her because she was showing me 'mixed' areas." The auditor was shown homes in non-"mixed" areas.

In Woburn, Massachusetts, an agent absolutely refused to show a black woman auditor any houses, despite the fact she called for an appointment first. The agent claimed she would only show houses to husbands and wives together, yet another agent in the same small office had shown homes earlier that day to a white female auditor who was alone.

In Atlanta, Georgia, a white tester went first. She and the agent spotted a house as they were driving around and went to look at it. They found it to be overpriced, but later that afternoon, the same agent showed the house to the black tester and told her that the down payment was 10 percent instead of the 5 percent the white tester had been quoted.

Mr. MATHIAS. The forms of housing discrimination have become more subtle today. The complaints coming before fair housing enforcement agencies now include, among other things, marital status, unwillingness to count a spouse's income for credit purposes, age, and discrimination against the handicapped and children. All of these areas must be carefully monitored by fair housing advocate groups as well as by those agencies with enforcement powers.

Next Monday, April 10, the Senate Judiciary Committee on the Constitution will hold a hearing to examine the Department of Housing and Urban Development's enforcement powers in fair housing discrimination cases. S. 571, which I and Senator GLENN introduced, would authorize HUD to enter Federal suits for relief on behalf of individual complainants. It would also provide for the award of attorneys' fees to the successful complainant, which would make the law almost self-enforcing. We have been joined in sponsoring this legislation by Senators BAYH and HUMPHREY.

In the long term, Mr. President, I believe we shall overcome the obstacles, however concealed, to achieving open and equal access to housing.

This April also marks the 10th anniversary of the death of our national leader in the struggle for civil rights, Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr. We need only recall the stirring words of Dr. King in Selma, Ala., on March 21, 1965, to strengthen our own commitment to the mission he began.

Let us march on to the realization of the American dream . . . for all of us here today the battle is in our hands. The road ahead is not altogether a smooth one. There are no broad highways to lead us easily and inevitably to quick solutions. . . . We are still in for a season of suffering. . . . How long? Not long, because no lie can live for ever. . . . Our God is marching on!

We must continue to be vigilant about fair housing so that the Federal institutions lead the way in providing fair housing and equal opportunity for all Americans.●

● Mr. GARN. Mr. President, I wish to commend our colleague, the senior Senator from Maryland, for his sponsorship of S. Con. Res. 74 which was submitted today and which proclaims April as Fair Housing Month.

It has been the established policy of this Government since 1968 that the terms, conditions, and privileges associated with selling or renting a dwelling are not to be determined by race, color, religion, or national origin. In 1974, "sex" was added to the categories of impermissible criteria for determining the terms of real estate rental and sales.

There is a broad national agreement that fair housing laws are an important aspect of the rights and privileges of Americans. The past few decades have brought progress in the area of civil rights that was long overdue. The National Fair Housing Law (title VIII of the Civil Rights Act of 1968) was designed primarily to aid black families who were unable to obtain equal treatment in the housing market. For them, the housing market was determined primarily by the color of their skin rather than their financial abilities and housing needs and desires. Of course, the 1968 act was directed at more than race discrimination but its main thrust was aimed at racism.

Governments and private organizations should continue to insure that, by law and in fact, citizens are not barred from moving from one neighborhood to another or from one community to another on grounds of race. To limit the housing opportunities available to blacks and other minorities to inner-city areas is to deny these people, on grounds other than their personal behavior, a chance to participate in or create for themselves a viable communal order.

It is often said that the greatest price of segregation is the perpetuation of a divided society, one black and the other white. While there is some merit in this view, it overlooks the fact that most ethnic groups, when reasonably free to choose a place to live, have chosen to live among people similar to themselves. (I am thinking especially of the predominantly Jewish suburbs.) The real price of segregation, in my opinion, is not that it forces blacks and whites apart but that it forces blacks of different class positions together. * * * The streets are no longer controlled by either the respectable residents or by the police, but by the members of an "underclass" who "viciously prey upon the weak, the old, and the unsuspecting," for whom fear is "something palpable that walks among us every day and will not leave us alone."

My quotation is from James Q. Wilson's excellent book, "Thinking About Crime" (Basic Books, New York). Professor Wilson's insight into discrimination, housing, community, and crime is excellent. Discriminatory housing laws have tended to promote the following phenomena: First, middle class blacks who would choose to leave the inner city are unable to do so because of discriminatory housing practices and are subjected to the despair and terror that often characterize the inner city. Their failure to leave may expose them to pressures that will create serious problems in the home as parents and children seek to withstand the pressures of the community. Again quoting Professor Wilson:

If a family sends its children to schools in which many students reject school work, if they live in an area where illegitimacy is as common as marriage, if they regularly encounter on the streets persons for whom self-expression is more attractive than self-control, the family will either find itself conforming to a standard it does not value or isolating itself from its neighbors. . . .

The second phenomenon that discriminatory housing practices has encouraged is the mistaken view among some whites that blacks, as a group, adhere to the lifestyle of that fraction of the black community that rejects what have been described as "middle class values"; for example, the work ethic, the value of education, the rejection of violence and crime and so on. If Professor Wilson is right, then the inability of "middle class" blacks to escape the communities dominated by the "underclass" is the most serious price of segregation. At the same time that middle class blacks are finding themselves trapped in the inner city, suburban whites are making incorrect generalizations about "all blacks" and the cycle of discrimination remains unbroken.

It is this cycle which fair housing laws are aimed at. These laws are designed to allow "middle class" blacks and other groups that have traditionally been the subject of discrimination (and "middle class" describes a family's values, not its income) to escape from the cycle that would have restricted their parents' options and maintained the mistaken stereotypes held by many whites.

I am always extremely gratified when a scholar of Professor Wilson's stature shows that simple fair play in the American tradition has such extraordinary results, for example, when fair housing turns out to be an important aspect of family solidarity and crime prevention.

Now, Mr. President, if I may turn my attention to another aspect of fair housing for a few minutes. When the fair housing law was passed, and amended, and indeed when any law is passed by this body there are legitimate constitutional and policy questions that arise. We must ask ourselves if a bill is constitutional, and if so, under what article and section of the Constitution is it authorized (since the Federal Government is one of limited powers, it must find within the Constitution authority for its actions)? If we conclude that a bill meets the constitutional standards, then we may ask under what circumstances does the bill conflict with other statutes or constitutional provisions, and to what extent should the bill be limited to reduce its potential conflicts and overextension? All of these questions were raised in 1968, and they are all legitimate questions. Congress and the courts have now agreed that the 1968 act met its constitutional requirements, that it does not unjustifiably infringe on the competing rights of property owners, for example.

Of course, the meaning of the 1968 Civil Rights Act, as amended, continues to be determined by agency regulations, administrative decisions, and judicial opinions. The Department of Justice and Brigham Young University (BYU) in Provo, Utah, are now negotiating over the meaning of the fair housing legislation as it relates to a private university making men students live with men students, and women students with women students. Apparently, the Department of Justice is convinced that BYU is breaking the law.

Brigham Young University is a privately owned and operated school. Its sponsor is the Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints. It requires single students, whether male or female, whether living on campus or off, to live in buildings or separate wings of buildings that are restricted to students of their own sex. The school has adopted this policy because it teaches and practices the highest standards of morality, including sexual morality, and it requires its students to live these standards. It has concluded that reasonable separation of the sexes in housing reinforces its moral teachings by helping maintain traditional restraint in relations between the sexes.

Naturally, this all seems perfectly reasonable and fair (since men and women are treated identically) and, in my opinion, constitutional. But the Justice Department (or perhaps the blame should be layed at the feet of Congress for enacting a statute that did not take every contingency into account) thinks that BYU is violating Federal housing laws and is threatening to sue. BYU maintains that its standards are nondiscriminatory (a point with which no one disagrees); all students are treated identically regardless of sex. Men cannot live in the women's wing; women cannot live in the men's wing. BYU also maintains that Justice's interpretation of the statute is inapt (I am tempted to say "inept") and that its practice is protected by the first amendment. The school contends that:

> Congress cannot have intended that the antidiscrimination laws be used to encourage sexual license or to establish the so-called "new morality." * * * We simply insist on our Constitutional right to teach and to require our students to live high moral standards and to foster housing patterns supportive of that effort.

I wholeheartedly support BYU's position. I also wholeheartedly support fair-housing legislation. And the fortunate thing is that we can have both: We can have anti-discrimination laws at the same time that we allow private, church-supported schools to teach high moral principles and exercise their first amendment rights. It is unfortunate that the Department of Justice thinks these goals are exclusive.

I think it is appropriate to remind the Department of Justice that the first section of the fair-housing provisions of the 1968 act reads:

> It is the policy of the United States to provide, within constitutional limitations, for fair housing throughout the United States." (Emphasis added.)

The Department ought to reconsider its position in light of the school's first amendment claims, congressional intent, and the logical implications of their position which will certainly mean that if men and women cannot be placed in separate wings of buildings then neither can they be placed in separate rooms of buildings.

I have cosponsored S. 2721, whose chief sponsor is Senator MCCLURE, that would permit private educational institutions to require separate housing for students and staff by sex. I hope that we do not reach the point where S. 2721 is needed. The Department of Justice and BYU are still discussing the matter, and doing so in a reasonable manner, and I hope that an agreement can be reached short of litigation.

I support fair housing; I also support reasonable distinctions and BYU's case for their practice is fully supported by law and reason. I am pleased to support both Senator MATHIAS' fair housing resolution and Senator MCCLURE's "private school freedom" bill. Both represent the American ideal, and they are compatible with each other.

I include two letters that are relevant to the situation and ask unanimous consent that they be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the letters were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

U.S. DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE,
Washington, D.C., February 28, 1978.

Re Proposed Lawsuit. United States v. Brigham Young University, et al. (D. Utah)

Mr. H. HAL VISICK,
Assistant to the President and General Counsel, Brigham Young University, Provo, Utah.

DEAR MR. VISICK: Please refer to the correspondence between you and attorneys from this Division in March and April 1977.

This Department has now completed an extensive, time-consuming and painstaking investigation into the off-campus housing policies of Brigham Young University (BYU) and the housing practices of the major apartment complexes which BYU has approved for off-campus housing by its students, to determine whether these policies and practices are consistent with the Fair Housing Act of 1968, 42 U.S.C. § 3601 et seq., as amended. On the basis of this investigation, this Department has reasonable cause to believe that BYU has caused landlords to segregate their apartment buildings on the basis of sex as a condition of being eligible to house BYU students, and that by this practice, both BYU and the landlords have engaged in a pattern and practice of discrimination in violation of the Act and have denied equal housing opportunity to groups of persons under circumstances which raise a question of general public importance. See 42 U.S.C. § 3613. While we have carefully considered the contentions in your letter of April 20, 1977, to Ms. Joan Magagna of our office, and while we appreciate the temperate and reasonable tone in which it was written, we do not believe that the practices in question are exempt from the provisions of the Act under 42 U.S.C. § 3607, or that institution of the proposed lawsuit would deny BYU or its students any rights protected by the First Amendment. Accordingly, we have determined, pursuant to this Department's authority under § 3613, that such practices require injunctive and affirmative relief to insure the full enjoyment of rights secured by the Act.

Accordingly, the undersigned has been authorized and directed to file a civil suit alleging violations of the Fair Housing Act by BYU and 36 other defendants who own or manage apartments in Provo, Utah. The complaint, which is to be filed in the United States District Court for the District of Utah, alleges, among other things, that the defendants have refused to rent dwellings to persons because of their sex, and have discriminated in the terms, conditions or privileges of rental because of the sex of the renter. The gravamen of the complaint is that, by requiring sexual segregation in housing covered by the Act, BYU and the landlords have engaged in practices which deny housing to individuals on grounds prohibited by the Act. We also believe that rules which permit men but not women students to live in specified kinds of apartments are forbidden by the Act.

We recognize that the problems of sex segregation in housing occupied in part by students are of a sensitive character, and we are particularly anxious to ascertain whether a negotiated settlement can be reached. We are looking towards a resolution which will correct what we believe to be unlawful conduct, while at the same time limiting federal intrusion into the practices of BYU and the landlords to the minimum compatible with equal opportunity. See United States v. West Peachtree Tenth Corp., 437 F. 2d 221, 229 (5th Cir. 1971). Accordingly, we are prepared to delay the filing of this suit for a period of approximately one month, to afford all defendants an opportunity to enter into a consent decree to be filed simultaneously with the complaint, if agreement on the terms of such a decree can be promptly negotiated. The specifics of an appropriate consent decree, of course, depend on the circumstances of the case, and during negotiations it may be necessary for us to obtain further information in order to formulate the details of the remedy required in this case. We believe that the decree should prohibit sexual discrimination or segregation at all housing covered by the Act and require reasonable steps to correct any continuing effects of past practices. The details of the transition to nondiscriminatory residential opportunities can be worked out during negotiations, or, if a settlement cannot be reached, then through litigation. We wish to assure you, in any event, that, whether the case is settled or litigated, our approach will be as sensitive to the problems of all concerned as we believe that the Fair Housing Act permits.

We urge that you contact us promptly and advise us as to whether you believe that it would be helpful to initiate negotiations towards a consent judgment which would require the end of segregation in housing by sex, at least in the absence of compelling considerations of privacy. If you believe that such negotiations would be helpful, we propose that you and the attorneys for the landlords meet with representatives of this Department at a mutually convenient time and place to discuss an appropriate decree. If an agreement has not been reached within a reasonable period after negotiations begin, and it appears that no agreement is imminent at that time, it will be our responsibility to file the suit. We would, of course, be prepared to continue to discuss a negotiated settlement of the case even after the lawsuit has been filed, and we would agree to such reasonable extensions of time for answering the complaint or otherwise pleading as may be appropriate under the circumstances.

Please feel free to contact the undersigned (202) 739-4123 or Mr. Daniel P. O'Hanlon (202) 739-4139 if you have any questions concerning the matters set forth in this letter. Assistant Attorney General Drew S. Days, at whose direction the undersigned is writing this letter, is personally aware of the complexity and sensitivity of the issues in this case and has asked us to advise you of his personal interest in it and his availability to meet with you. He will not, of course, be in a position to personally handle protracted and detailed negotiations.

We are sending copies of this letter to 36 landlords, and also inviting them to initiate negotiations with us. We enclose a copy of our cover letter to the landlords. We hope that this matter can be promptly and amicably settled on a nondiscriminatory basis which recognizes the rights of all concerned.

Sincerely,

DREW S. DAYS, III,
Assistant Attorney General Civil Rights Division.

Chief, Housing and Credit Section.

BRIGHAM YOUNG UNIVERSITY,
March 14, 1978.

Re Proposed Lawsuit: United States v. Brigham Young University, et al. (D. Utah)

Hon. DREW S. DAYS III,
Assistant Attorney General, U.S. Department of Justice, Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. DAYS: In order to respond appropriately to your letter dated February 28, 1978 (received March 6, 1978), we need further clarification of your contention that BYU and 36 local landlords are violating the Federal Fair Housing Act, 42 U.S.C. § 3601, et seq., as amended. We therefore request that you respond to the questions set out in this letter.

As you will realize, Brigham Young University must assure that a variety of housing arrangements are available for its 25,000 students. In the current semester we are providing housing for 5,220 single students in dormitories and individual apartment units on the University campus. Another 13,260 single students live in Provo and adjourning communities in private off campus housing, and 2,490 reside with their parents or other relatives. Most of the 13,260 students who are renting in the community live in individual apartments housing four to six single students in buildings containing 4 to 50 such units. In the typical housing arrangement each individual student signs a rental agreement with his or her landlord. This agreement gives the student a right to occupy one of these apartments along with three to five others, each of whom also signs individual rental agreements.

We are unsure which of the several elements of our housing picture you are challenging. Though you may be attacking only one or two of these arrangements, our concerns extend to the housing of every student and, therefore, we seek to understand how your proposed action will affect each housing arrangement.

Since receiving your letter from a member of the press and making our initial general response (a copy of which is enclosed for your information) we have been asked many questions. Our students, friends, cooperating landlords, and persons with similar interests in other colleges and universities have asked such questions as: Is the government attacking sex separation in Brigham Young University's on-campus housing? Is the government proposing to create a situation where the law would compel an off-campus landlord to put single students of different sexes in the same multiple-student apartment? How does BYU justify applying its policies to off-campus landlords? We desire to answer these questions, and seek clarification of your position so that we can do so.

We therefore request your answers to the following specific questions:

1. (a) Is it your position that Brigham Young University breaks the law when it assigns single students to campus dormitories and campus apartment buildings restricted to one sex?

(b) If not, what legal principle exempts university campus housing?

2. (a) Is it your position that Brigham Young University would break the law if it were to advise its single students who live in off campus housing that they will be dismissed if they live in an apartment with students of the opposite sex or in a building or wing not restricted to students of their own sex?

(b) If so, what provision of law would be violated by this policy?

(c) If not, is it your position that Brigham Young University violates the law when it makes this policy known to off-campus landlords and encourages them to set up housing arrangements that will permit our single students to rent from them?

3. We have been informed by Frank E. Schwelb, Chief of the Housing and Credit Section, that you are not attempting to force BYU to allow students of different sexes to live in a single apartment. Yet Section 3604 of the Act states that it is "unlawful . . . to refuse to . . . rent . . . or otherwise make unavailable . . . a dwelling to any person because of . . . sex. . . ." The Act defines "dwelling" as a building or any portion thereof. Therefore, the law seems to require that if a landlord has signed rental agreements with five women students to live in a six-student apartment and a male applies for housing, the landlord must rent the sixth space in that apartment to the male applicant. The law seems to compel this result even if the five women occupants or the landlord object on moral grounds and assert the right of privacy of the persons already in the apartment. You state that you are not trying to obtain that result, but we wish to know what provision of law supports your position while protecting us against the result just described.

4. If a landlord can consider the sex of an applicant in assigning that applicant to a multiple-occupancy apartment, why cannot the landlord consider the sex of the applicant in determining the building or wing of a building in which that applicant will be accommodated?

5. Title IX forbids sexual discrimination in federally assisted educational programs or activities. Section 86.32 of the Title IX regulations provides that separation of men and women students in on-and-off-campus housing is not discrimination on the basis of sex, so long as facilities of comparable quality are available. If this is a sound principle for federally assisted programs or activities (which are definitely not involved in BYU on-campus or off-campus housing), we invite you to consider the appropriateness of a similar interpretation of the Fair Housing Act. One department of government should not be in court to prevent actions in the private sector that another department expressly permits in federally assisted programs.

6. Your letter also charges that "the defendants have . . . discriminated in the terms, conditions or privileges of rental because of the sex of the renter." Could you please advise us what different "terms, conditions or privileges of rental" are referred to in this passage? Our current off-campus housing policies make no distinction as to the facilities or terms of rental for male and female students, except that they do require separate housing.

We are well aware that the Department of Justice does not make the laws in this country. You are charged only with administering the laws as they are embodied in acts of Congress and court decisions. The fact that representatives of your Department state that they have no present intention of forcing us to permit single men and women to live in the same apartment is very little comfort if there is no legal distinction between this result and the one you are presently pursuing. Your letter states that "The gravaman of the complaint is that, by requiring sexual segregation in housing covered by the Act, BYU and the landlords have engaged in practices which deny housing to individuals on ground prohibited by the Act." It states further that "the decree should prohibit sexual discrimination or segregation at all housing covered by the Act. . . ." "All housing" may well include individual apartment units. Consequently, you can see why we need clarification of this issue before we make our formal response to your letter.

We are also troubled by the fact that the Justice Department, which is charged with protecting the civil rights of all citizens, here asserts a right based on statute against our constitutional right to the free exercise of religion guaranteed by the First Amendment. We cannot believe that our proscription against students living with or next to persons of the opposite sex is a sufficient injury to justify interference with the fundamental right of religious freedom at this church-sponsored university. This is particularly true when students know and accept our rules when they enroll and can obtain the privileges you seek to enforce simply by attending another institution.

We appreciate the temperate tone of your letter. We hope we may continue this spirit in our future communications, negotiations, or possible litigation. We also hope you will be able to respond to our questions promptly so as to clarify your position and help us reply to your initial letter in an appropriate manner.

Your letter of February 28th was in the hands of the local media before we received it in the University. While we understand from Mr. Schwelb that this was not your design, the publication of that communication has made it appropriate for us to give copies of this letter to the press at approximately the time you will receive it. Future exchanges of information and negotiations may be conducted more privately, though each of us will, of course, need to make our final positions known publicly when we have completed our preliminary communications and negotiations.

Sincerely,

DALLLIN H. OAKS.●

ADDITIONAL STATEMENTS

UN OPERATIONS IN SOUTHERN LEBANON

● Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, the Committee on Foreign Relations has received a detailed response from the Department of State to Senator SPARKMAN's request concerning United Nations operations in southern Lebanon. I ask that the exchange of correspondence be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

MARCH 22, 1978.

Hon. CYRUS R. VANCE,
Secretary of State,
Washington, D.C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: I am writing to you concerning the intent of UN Resolution 425 (1978) with respect to restoring the peace in southern Lebanon. As you know, the UN Resolution calls for the withdrawal by Israel of its forces in southern Lebanon, "restoring international peace and security and assisting the Government of Lebanon in insuring the return of its effective authority in the area . . ." Specifically, the Committee is concerned about the mandate of the United Nations forces that will be brought into southern Lebanon.

According to the Secretary General's Report on UN Resolution 425, he envisages the responsibility of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon "as a two-stage operation. In the first stage the Force will confirm the withdrawal of Israeli forces from Lebanense territory and maintain an area of operation as defined (in his report). In this connection it will supervise the cessation of hostilities, ensure the peaceful character of the area of operation, and take all measures deemed necessary to assure the effective restoration of Lebanese sovereignty."

Specifically, the Committee on Foreign Relations seeks confirmation that the objective of the Force, along with confirming Israeli withdrawal, is to prevent the re-entry of armed Palestinian forces, whether members of the Palestine Liberation Organization or other armed Palestinian units, into southern Lebanon and to restore full sovereignty and control of southern Lebanon to the Lebanese Government so that the terrorist attacks on Israel perpetrated by Palestinian groups will not recur. Furthermore, does the Force have a mandate sufficient to prevent the in situ establishment of organizational and political structures that might, at a moment's notice, be rearmed and re-equipped as an effective fighting force? In addition, considering that the Resolution in the Security Council was agreed upon before the completion of the military operation in southern Lebanon, can you confirm in writing the areas in southern Lebanon over which the UN will have supervision.

The Committee also would appreciate a report from the Department of State on the humanitarian assistance we may render in southern Lebanon.

The Foreign Relations Committee will appreciate a detailed reply on the points raised above.

Sincerely,

JOHN SPARKMAN,
Chairman.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, D.C., March 31, 1978.

Hon. JOHN SPARKMAN,
Chairman, Committee on Foreign Relations, U.S. Senate.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: In the absence of the Secretary, I am replying to your letter of March 22 to him concerning United Nations Security Council Resolution 425 and the terms of reference of the United Nations Interim Force in Lebanon (UNIFIL). Before addressing your specific questions regarding the objective and the mandate of UNIFIL, I would like to discuss our aims in putting forward Resolution 425.

As you know, south Lebanon has long been a particularly dangerous area, posing a threat both to the stability of the Lebanese state and to the security of Israel. We have always been concerned that events there might spark another full-scale Arab-Israeli war or frustrate the efforts that are being made to reach a peaceful settlement of the Middle East conflict. Moreover, the fighting in the south in recent years has created a refugee problem which has taken on much greater dimensions following the recent Israeli incursion. The continuing cycle of violence has resulted in widespread death, destruction and suffering by innocent people. The only complete solution to this problem lies in accomprehensive settlement of all Middle East peace issues, a course which the President and Secretary Vance are pursuing vigorously. In the meantime, over the past months and prior to this most recent crisis we were working at various times with the parties in the area to arrive at an agreement which would reestablish Lebanese authority in the south. It is in the context of that previous effort that the current action of the Security Council must be understood.

Our goals in proposing Resolution 425 were:

To stop the fighting in southern Lebanon;

To obtain withdrawal of Israeli forces;

To engage the United Nations in assisting the Government of Lebanon to restore its authority in the south;

To prevent a return to the status quo ante in south Lebanon, with the threat it posed to Israel of attacks by armed Palestinians and other hostile elements;

To involve the international community in a major effort to preclude the reemergence of those conditions which led to the cycle of violence in southern Lebanon and in Israel; and

Finally, to begin the process of restoring security and peaceful conditions in this area to encourage and facilitate the return of the several hundred thousand people who have fled their homes and who were victims, along with Israeli civilians, of the status quo ante.

In support of these goals we proposed the creation of a United Nations Force for southern Lebanon. We recognized that such a Force could not of itself provide effective remedies to the problems which led to the violence. Such remedies can only come through the extension of effective Lebanese authority in the area. It is important to emphasize that the extension of Lebanese authority is a point on which all the states concerned—Israel, Lebanon, troop contributors and the Security Council membership as a whole—are formally agreed. The Security Council resolution and the UN Force mandate therefore underline this central point. The UN Force, of course, cannot impose this outcome; but it can facilitate it in a way not open to any party to the dispute. We will be working with the governments concerned and with the UN to promote the reestablishment of stability and Lebanese authority; success in this difficult and complicated UN endeavor can only be achieved with the cooperation of all concerned. We are making, therefore, every possible diplomatic effort to encourage the required cooperation. I should also note that the UN Force is contemplated as temporary in nature and described as interim in the resolution. The initial period of deployment is for six months which could be renewed. This time-limited concept is in keeping with UNIFIL's primary goal of helping the Lebanese government reestablish its own effective control and authority in the south.

We believe that UNIFIL's objectives should be as broad as possible within the realm of what it can practically achieve. The mandate was carefully drafted in order to grant the Secretary General the authority he requires while at the same time obtaining the necessary degree of support for passage by the Security Council.

In view of the delicacy of the situation in south Lebanon and the complexity of the task force, Secretary General Waldheim's mandate to the UN Force is not detailed and explicit on all points. The main lines of UNIFIL's mandate are nonetheless clear.

It is clearly the intention of both Resolution 425 and Secretary General Waldheim's March 19 report that the area of UNIFIL's responsibility should no longer be a battlefield or used as a launching pad for attacks on Israel. Paragraph 2(b) of the March 19 report calls upon the Force to "assist the Government of Lebanon in ensuring the return of its effective authority in the area." Paragraph 2(d) states that the Force "will use its best efforts to prevent the recurrence of fighting and to ensure that its area of operation is not utilized for hostile activities of any kind." Paragraph 6 states that the Force "will supervise the cessation of hostilities, ensure the peaceful character of the area of operation, control movement and take all measures deemed necessary to assure the effective restoration of Lebanese sovereignty." As soon as the report was approved by the Security Council, the Secretary General made a statement elaborating on it and specifying that the Force would endeavor to control movement "into and out of the zone." We regard this as an important clarification of the language of the report itself and as responsive to your query whether one objective of UNIFIL is to prevent the reentry of armed Palestinian forces into southern Lebanon. As you know, some such forces are still in southern Lebanon, however, both in areas south of the Litani River, and north and east of the Litani, where Israeli military operations did not reach. This is why it is important to consider UNIFIL's mandate in its totality, including ensuring that its area of operation is not utilized for hostile activities of any kind, rather than to rely on any one element of that mandate in isolation.

Initially, the Force will expand its area of operation by moving south from the Litani River to the Israeli border. There is, of course, no direct link or conditionality in Resolution 425 between Israeli withdrawal and UNIFIL deployment. Nevertheless, we would expect UN officials on the ground to be in touch with Israeli authorities to discuss practical problems of UN deployment and Israeli withdrawal. We believe the definition of the "area of operation" for the Force is sufficently broad to permit it to move into other areas as requested by the Government of Lebanon as well, once it has been deployed in adequate strength and its initial tasks have been fulfilled.

As concerns your question about UNIFIL's mandate in regard to prevention of the establishment of organizational and political structures that might be rearmed and reequipped to become a fighting force, the key to this issue is precisely the restoration of effective Lebanese authority in the area of the conflict. This is the heart of the crisis, and one that we will bear in mind in our contacts with the United Nations and the parties.

You also asked about our plans for humanitarian assistance. In response to the problem of the 170,000 or more people who fled the fighting and at the request of the Lebanese government, we began on March 23 an airlift of relief supplies from Agency for International Development stockpiles in Leghorn, Italy. Supplies worth $1.2 million, including blankets, tents, water jugs, stoves for mass feeding, and medicines have arrived in Beirut. They are being distributed to those in need through the High Relief Committee of the Lebanese government. As a working hypothesis, we are prepared to make up to $5 million available from disaster relief funds to meet further requirements for relief for these displaced people.

Some of these displaced people are already beginning to return to southern Lebanon. As security there is restored, we expect that eventually the great mass of people who had left the area, not only as a result of the most recent fighting, but also in the months since 1976, will return. We believe there should be a major international effort to assist in the rehabilitation programs that will be so essential, and that the United States should play its role. We are now considering ways in which damaged homes can be rebuilt, essential services can be restored, the quality of medical care can be improved, and credit facilities for farms can be provided. We will be consulting with Congress as our planning proceeds.

I would be happy to arrange for appropriate officers of the Department to discuss this, or any other issue pertaining to the southern Lebanon problem, with the Committee.

Sincerely,

DOUGLAS J. BENNET, Jr.,
Assistant Secretary for Congressional Relations.●

ROCKY FUTURE FOR ROCKFISH?

● Mr. MATHIAS. Mr. President, among the magnificent flora and fauna of Maryland none is more magnificent than the rockfish or striped bass. This denizen of Chesapeake Bay and the rivers that feed the bay has long been admired by sports fishermen for its gameness and by gourmet diners for its subtle flavor.

But, as happens so often when too many people discover a good thing, the rockfish, or to use its proper Latin moniker, roccus saxatilis is in serious trouble. Their ranks—once ample for fishing and dining enthusiasts alike—are yearly depleted by a combination of factors, including overfishing and underbreeding. And the waters they frequent are increasingly polluted.

Happily, however, the State of Maryland has recognized the threat to the rockfish and has made a timely move to protect them. But, Maryland alone cannot turn the tide. The rockfish problem is a regional one and will require regional solutions. If the magnificent creature that was designated Maryland's official fish by act of the Maryland General Assembly in 1965 is to flourish, most of the States on the Atlantic coast will have to follow Maryland's example and move to protect rockfish at least seasonally.

So that my colleagues may appreciate the nature of the rockfish problem that affects so much of the east coast, I commend to their attention a delightfully written and comprehensive account of the plight of the rockfish by Gene Mueller, published in The Washington Star on March 24, 1978.

I ask that this article, entitled "The Striped Bass—Beleaguered Symbol of Maryland," be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

THE STRIPED BASS—BELEAGUERED SYMBOL OF MARYLAND

In the rips and backwaters the young menhaden and herring and eels were plentiful. The nights were noisy as the bass fed and fattened on them. . . . So came a cloudless night of thin moon. . . . In the marshes, gathering, black ducks were raucous.—"The Shining Tides" by Win Brooks.

(By Gene Mueller)

Perhaps it is a fitting tribute that there should be a creature that can create an emotional debate in the Maryland legislature as easily as it can in a Baltimore street corner pub.

Even the scientific community can't completely agree on an official name. Is it Roccus Saxatilis or Morone Saxitilis? Either one will do. Lesser mortals will just as quickly recognize it as a striped bass or rockfish.

One simple fact, however, cannot be argued with. The state fish of Maryland—the stripped bass—is a most troubled fellow. It is in dire straits from the blue shoal waters of North Carolina to the rock-strewn coastline of Massachusetts. That much is agreed upon.

The questions and arguments will go on as long as there is gasoline to be pumped into fishing boats which search the Atlantic or nearby Chesapeake for the striped delicacy. The status of this majestic fish will be in doubt for years to come, and answers aren't easy to come by.

We do know, for example, that the striper's major eastern producing areas are the Pamlico Sound, N.C., the Chesapeake Bay and Delaware Bay. We also know it's an anadromous species that spends most of its life in the sea, but ascends freshwater rivers to breed. April and May is spawning time hereabouts, with rockfish able to trigger the breeding act in water temperatures anywhere from 58–70 degrees.

Oddly, there is a critical 60-minute period following ovulation during which the striper female's eggs must be extruded if spawning is to be successful. Eggs retained by the female longer than the 60-minute period will be overripe and next to impossible to fertilize.

So much for what we know. Unfortunately, most of us are also aware that with each passing year, for at least 10 years running, the overall number of the striped bass has declined dramatically. Accusations come quickly. Blame it on pollution, on commercial netters, or on a hurricane that probably wiped out the newborn class of 1972.

"I used to buy rockfish for about 20–30 cents a pound," says Galesville's John Tucker who's lived along the Chesapeake all of his 44 years. "Seven or eight years ago you could get as many as you wanted at that price direct from local gill netters. Now . . ." Tucker's voice trails off and he slowly shakes his head. It's a powerful comment from a native son of the Chesapeake.

The good days of yore are no longer. As little as five years ago commercial fishermen in Maryland reported landings of 4,976,000 pounds. By 1977 the total catch had dipped to 1.2 million pounds. Rockfish suddenly started selling as if they were grain-fed on western pastures.

Surely, massive pollution of water and air can be pointed out as one of the responsible culprits. All that lives—including the striped bass fishery—is affected by it.

But the accusing finger more often than not is directed toward the netters—the men who try to earn a living out of the sea. Gill netters and haul seiners would be hard-pressed entering a popularity contest in the midst of a group of sport fishermen.

Sport anglers, the trollers and surf casters of the mid-Atlantic states, look down with distaste on the commercial men. The netters, they say, are robbing them of a magnificent resource. Emotion runs high, and only a true lover of the hook-and-line sport can understand this dislike of the weather-beaten shore folk who fill the mesh—at times—with other people's favorite sporting prey.

"If a committee of sport fishermen tried to design a fish for general popularity, impressive appearance, excellent table qualities, fighting heart; and the indefinable aura of mystery that makes good fish great, it would be hard-put to do better than nature's very own striped bass, Roccus Saxatilis," says Frank T. Moss, nationally known marine angling authority and author.

Moss speaks of handsome profile, robust build, a fish capable of withstanding wide temperature differences, which is equipped to live in the coastal regions of the Atlantic, Pacific, or even freshwater impoundments.

Small wonder then why such awe is commanded by it from millions of faithful anglers throughout the United States.

Heated arguments were commonplace when commercial netters laid siege to the rockfish around the four-mile-long Bay Bridge again last summer. Sport fishermen demanded that Maryland state officials step in and halt the senseless slaughter of thousands of stripers which would end up on dinner tables along the coast. Bills were introduced in the legislature to keep netters away from this major congregation ground of the rockfish. It was to no avail. The watermen carry a potent voice and lobby in Annapolis.

But in February Maryland's Department of Natural Resources took a courageous step. Under emergency law it declared the major rockfish spawning rivers of the Chesapeake off limits to everyone—commercial and sports interests—between March 15 and June 1. It was obvious that the outcries from the public had reached a sympathetic ear.

The professional netters became incensed. Charges were placed that expensive equipment had been purchased in anticipation of netting migrating spawning fish that enter Maryland waters each spring. Again, the commercial men made inroads. The river netting ban was shortened to between April 26 and June 1.

Despite the disappointment felt by sport anglers it is generally agreed that some progress was made, however. Traditions fall hard in Maryland. But it happened. More protective moves may be accomplished in the future.

Now, the Choptank, Nanticoke, Patuxent, Wicomico, Blackwater, Pocomoke, Transquaking, Chester, Manokin, and the Potomac above the Harry W. Nice Bridge are sanctuaries for striped bass for a critical 36 days this spring. There are several other areas north of Abbey and Worton points, including the Sassafras, Elk, Northeast, Susquehanna River and Flats, and that portion of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal within Maryland, that will be protected between May 6 and June 1.

In addition, one of the greatest rockfish grounds on the Atlantic, the Outer Banks of North Carolina, are also somewhat regulated. There was a day when unabated surf netting would see thousands of pounds of gasping stripers laying on the beaches of Hatteras Island. These were frequently giant females that would never see a Maryland sunrise, or get a chance to deposit their eggs—all because of money offered by seafood stores and pet food processing plants.

On the other side of the rockfish arguments are the biologists who for obvious reasons must keep a clear head and not fall prey to emotion. The Natural Resources specialists who worry a great deal about the fuure of the striped bass—be it for netters or sport fishermen—feel that unilateral action of additional protective legislations for rockfish would probably not help significantly when the overall picture is taken into account.

Maryland is the keystone of the Atlantic striper population. Yet, when DNR personnel tagged and released 1,375 striped bass weighing from 15 to 70 pounds during the 1972 and 1973 spawning runs, an astounding 94 percent of the 126 recaptured fish was reported from outside of Maryland. It offers proof that the striper moves about greatly and doesn't—as some people believe—live out his days in Maryland alone.

The powers in Annapolis are among the very few who have afforded protection to striped bass by way of harvest restrictions, seasons and off-limits fishing areas. Thus it becomes an exercise in futility when worried men and women care for the future of a resource that gets very little help, if any, from their nearest neighbor, Virginia—to name just one.

It's the well-worn line of the weakest link in the chain, and so on. If one 50-lb. female rockfish, for example, is intercepted in nets before she reaches protected Maryland waters some five million eggs will be lost forever.

Much is yet to be done. Pollution takes a heavy toll of eggs, larvae, and juvenile fish. Dredging of coastal bays and rivers destroys nursery grounds. Damming of rivers robs the striper of breeding locations. The list is almost endless.

It becomes a national coastal problem then. It's a giant hurdle the federal government may eventually have to clear. Atlantic states will have to join hands and come to grips with the ever-growing decline of this magnificent creature.●

WE WILL NOT FORGET MARTIN LUTHER KING—HE AFFECTED OUR LIVES

● Mr. METZENBAUM. Mr. President, one of the proudest moments of my life occurred some 15 years ago when I was privileged to walk shoulder-to-shoulder with the Rev. Martin Luther King through the streets of Selma, Ala. That symbolic moment marked a high point in the struggle of millions of Americans who had been denied their basic freedoms for nearly two centuries.

Of all those who have fought the evils of bigotry and hatred, few have made the impact on our society that Dr. King did.

Sadly, as is the case so many times, those who carry the banner of justice are struck down by the sword of injustice. Such was the case with Martin Luther King.

This week, we mark the 10th anniversary of that tragic day when Dr. King died at the hands of an assassin in Memphis, Tenn. Since then, many of the dreams he expressed in his memorable speech at the Lincoln Memorial have come true. Many have not.

But there can be no doubt that Dr. King laid a foundation upon which generations to come can build.

Yes, there is still racism in America. But because of Dr. King's contributions, there is hope for all of us.

Yes, black Americans have not yet achieved their rightful status in our society in many areas. But because Dr. King walked among us, all Americans are aware of the injustices and have been spurred to eliminate them.

Yes, there is still poverty, despair, and deprivation. But because of Dr. King's example, black Americans have shown the world that by their own efforts they can surmount these obstacles with dignity and pride.

As Haynes Johnson of the Washington Post put it so aptly in a column last Sunday, Dr. King was able to do these things because he was "a man of dreams and visions and no American expressed them with more eloquence and conviction."

Mr. President, I can think of no finer tribute to the memory of Dr. King than the words spoken by the Rev. Jesse Jackson, a man who knew him so well:

He would challenge us not to lose the spirit of reconciliation. He believed as long as people are living, they chan change. He would never give up on that.●

OUTSTANDING YOUNG FARMER AWARD

● Mr. BAYH. Mr. President, I am proud to inform my colleagues that Louis Abbett of La Crosse, Ind., has been chosen from a group of 38 State winners as one of the Nation's four outstanding young farmers for 1977–78.

The Outstanding Young Farmer Awards are conducted by the U.S. Jaycees and sponsored by the John Deere Co. Through this program, the Jaycees and John Deere strive to recognize the noteworthy achievements of today's young farmers and to encourage better understanding between urban and rural America.

Indiana is blessed with many able and hardworking farmers. Yet it is clear that Louis Abbett stands out as an exceptional farm manager. Originally he rented two small farms to earn money for college. Later, while working on his own farm he also taught school to obtain necessary capital. Despite some setbacks, Abbett consistently improved his farm and his equipment. Now, he is president of the La Porte County Row Crop Producers Association and Indiana Corn Growers Association, and he is also active in other important farm and civic groups.

I am pleased to congratulate a fellow Hoosier, Louis Abbett, for his impressive achievements in his agricultural career and community service which have earned him the National Outstanding Farmer Award. Louis Abbett illustrates the efficient management and strong character of America's young farmers on whom the Nation and the world will increasingly depend.●

REDUCING WORLD NUCLEAR ARMS ARSENALS

● Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, Mr. Irving Laucks of Santa Barbara, Calif., has long contributed to the cause of peace in word and deed. Recently, he continued his commitment to work for peace by encouraging others to think about ways to end the nuclear arms race.

The Laucks Foundation, an educational institution he established recently sponsored an essay contest on the subject of "preventing nuclear war."

The Santa Barbara News-Press carried the prize-winning essay by Mr. Wallace T. Drew, a Santa Barbara businessman. The centerpiece of Mr. Drew's essay is the proposal that an international organization supervise the destruction of 2 percent of each nuclear-capable country's weapons.

I am sure Wallace Drew shares my appreciation that our President is committed to this very purpose of controlling the arms race—not just through limitations of existing weaponry—but through nuclear arms reductions.

The proposed SALT II agreement, which is still under negotiation, is reported to make the first step toward reducing nuclear weapons now in existence, as well as controlling future developments. SALT II would require the Soviet Union to dismantle over 300 of its nuclear missiles and heavy strategic bombers.

The U.S. smaller strategic force would not be affected in this way by SALT II. However, SALT II is expected to set the stage for building on this precedent of reducing existing arms arsenals. The statement of principles for SALT III contained in the SALT II agreement hopefully will pledge the United States and the Soviet Union to negotiate significant reductions in both countries nuclear forces.

Mr. Drew's thoughtful essay also addresses other methods of preventing nuclear war through controlling nuclear weapons. I ask that his full essay, as reported by the News-Press of December 25, 1977, be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks. I congratulate Wallace Drew for his prize-winning essay and Irving Laucks for his continuing encouragement to Americans who seek to prevent nuclear war.

The article follows:

LAUCKS FOUNDATION WINNING ESSAY—A PROPOSAL FOR SAVING HUMANITY FROM NUCLEAR WARFARE

(By Wallace T. Drew)

During my many years as an Episcopal layman, I have developed serious concerns about the implications of nuclear weaponry, and have given a great deal of thought and study of the methods devised for bringing about a society on earth closer to that which God envisioned—a world of peace and serenity, justice and beauty, free of the terror of nuclear blackmail.

My thoughts spring from the following premises, that:

1. Preparation for war and defense is a crushing financial burden on peoples of all nations, prventing achievement of peaceful objectives.

2. Existence of nuclear weapons leads to temptation to use them to settle disputes or achieve national ambitions.

3. Focus on nuclear weaponry detracts from research on peaceful use of the atom and of solving the environmental problems involved both for the present generation and for posterity.

4. The present method of achieving detente among the major powers—nuclear standoff—involves unacceptable risks.

5. The will of the people is to secure peace, as evidenced by the many international organizations that have been set up over the years with the sole purpose of obtaining peace. The enemies of peace, however, have been consistently successful in check-mating peace moves in international organizations. Witness the tortuous negotiations and dismayingly small successes in the United Nations commissions working to halt nuclear weapon proliferations. One antidote to this situation is to seek new methods and new organizations through which success might possibly be more easily achieved.

Having accepted the above premises, it is easy for me to welcome and encourage new concepts for achievement of peace and avoidance of nuclear war. As a follower of Christ, indeed, I can take no other course. "Blessed are the peacemakers: for they shall be called the Children of God"—Matthew 5:9 King James Version.

One new concept brightens the prospects for the future—a serious new proposal made by an educational organization called "The Cooperators" of the Laucks Foundation of Santa Barbara, Calif., Irving Laucks, president.

This proposal is entitled "A Suggested Six-Point Plan for Peace," and is well worth examining closely because it provides for specific steps to be taken within a limited time frame.

Point one proposes that the president of the United States order the destruction of 2 percent of the nuclear weapons of the United States.

This would be a step in the right direction. The first step must necessarily be modest if only to reassure our own citizens, while giving evidence of our commitment to the other nations involved. It would also encourage matching steps from the other major nuclear powers. L. I. Brezhnev, chairman of the presidium of the Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R., recently proposed again a stop to testing of nuclear weapons and an end to the arms race and could respond favorably with a two percent reduction in atomic arms in the Soviet Union.

Point two provides that the president of the United States ask other nations to:

A. Destroy two percent of their nuclear weapons, and

B. Join the United States in a "Federation for Peace," composed of all nations with nuclear weapons, plus two other members of the United Nations, to develop a plan for the gradual and complete destruction of all nuclear weapons and general disarmament.

This point follows naturally in the path of point one and assumes correctly that the stage-by-stage method of weapon destruction will be most reassuring to citizens of the major powers.

Point three provides that the nations belonging to the "Federation for Peace" would bind themselves to a treaty to form an international commission which would supervise a step-by-step disarmament process, which might take five years to complete.

It seems likely that negotiations will be more protracted than five years, since general disarmament is involved in addition to destruction of atomic weapons. The Soviet Union may be reluctant to reduce its large land army in fear of Chinese forces, or a possible loss of control in Eastern European satellite nations. France, accustomed to playing a lone hand in nuclear matters since withdrawing from the United Nations Disarmament Commission in 1962, may require extended persuasion. India and Brazil, nations on the fringes of the nuclear weapons community, may be loath to sacrifice anticipated power. And the United States may be slow to ratify, fearing sacrifice of nuclear superiority, real or fancied.

The Soviet Union has a slow examination system of such measures through the autonomous and regional Soviets before consideration by the Supreme Soviet.

Point four provides for trade and military sanctions and actions by the "Federation for Peace" to ensure compliance with weapon destruction orders. It is hoped that such actions would be taken only as a last resort since history shows they cause a reaction of fear and incite national pugnacity. It may be necessary to take such measures in the end. God's will in the matter is carved in the granite "Isaiah Wall" across First Avenue in New York from the United Nations buildings:

"And he shall judge among the nations, and shall rebuke many people: and they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruninghooks. Nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more."—Isaiah 2:4.

Point five provides for an international court of justice to decide disputes between nations. This should not be too difficult to create, since most nations accepts the principles of international law, and such tribunals already exist.

Point six provides for liaison and support by the "Federation for Peace" of the United Nations and its agencies and eventually for a phaseout and assignment of the peacekeeping role to the United Nations. This should help to allay the fears of some members of the United Nations, particularly the Third World and non-nuclear nation members, that the "Federation for Peace" may be a deceptive device that may allow the nuclear powers to "go their own way," to establish private agreements among themselves, and to circumvent already established commissions designed to solve these very problems.

The answer is that the charter of the United Nations recognizes the usefulness of such organizations as the "Federation for peace," and many have official connections with one or more of the specialized U.N. agencies.

The question may be asked, "Why is the Federation for Peace necessary?"

A bit of history may provide the answer. The charter of the United Nations provides for formulation of disarmament plans in the Security Council, and disarmament has been a major concern of the United Nations since its inception.

The first resolution of the U.N. General Assembly (1946) set up a U.N. atomic commission to make proposals for the peaceful use of atomic energy and for the elimination of the weapons of mass destruction.

The commission concentrated its first debates on the Baruch Plan, which proposed an international agency to control all potentially dangerous atomic power. By 1948, Cold War hostility closed off all debate and the commission was at an impasse.

The issue languished until 1952 when the U.S. disarmament commission was organized under the Security Council to deal with all issues of disarmament. This commission became the repository for all disarmament proposals arrived at by groups inside or outside the United Nations. After the hydrogen bomb explosions by the United States (1952) and the Soviet Union (1953) the urgent need for disarmament became apparent. In 1963, a subcommittee of the commission was set up consisting of Canada, France, the United States and the Soviet Union.

Mounting disagreement in an atmosphere of mutual distrust between East and West took placed during meetings 1945–57. The West held that an international control system and on-site inspection must be developed before disarmament could proceed. The East rejected this position, stating that the West's position would result in inspection without disarmament, and proposed instead an immediate ban on nuclear weapons, without inspection but with possible later (and unspecified) controls. The West promptly rejected this position.

Impasse again! And there the matter stands today, 20 years later!

It is true that modest gains have been made since. In 1963 the United States, the United Kingdom and the U.S.S.R. reached the Moscow Agreement banning nuclear weapons testing in the atmosphere, outer space, or under water. In 1968 the United States and the Soviet Union drafted a proposal to the commission for a non-proliferation treaty on nuclear weapons which was approved by the U.N. General Assembly.

The Strategic Arms Limitations Talks (SALT) of 1972 by the United States and the Soviet Union agreed to limit antiballistic missiles and reached as interim accord limiting offensive nuclear weapons. Another SALT agreement on the same matters was reached at Vladivostok in November, 1974. Since that date little progress has been made partly because of the political turmoil in the United States associated with the change in the administration.

The atmosphere of distrust that persists between East and West, despite the healing balm of detente, is the major obstacle to disarmament, nuclear or otherwise.

Thus, a new thrust for disarmament agreement such as "A Suggested Six-Point Plan for Peace" is welcomed since it may well give a fresh new approach to the problem.

It is clear, that, as President Anwar al-Sadat of Egypt observed during his recent visit to Israel, achieving the psychological and emotional climate for peace is a precondition for international agreement.

The plan advanced by "The Cooperators" is, in my judgment, based on an intelligent appraisal of the psychological and emotional factors needed to achieve concord, and if skillfully employed can help lift the burden of the nuclear genii off the back of mankind and put it to work, this time for human advancement.●

BURLINGTON RESIDENTS CONGRATULATED ON BOND ISSUE APPROVALS

● Mr. LEAHY. Mr. President, the January 24, 1978, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD contains my congratulations to the Burlington, Vt., Electric Department for its successful experiment in the generation of electricity with wood.

Today, I would like to congratulate the residents of Burlington for the recent approval of three bond issues, all related to the generation of power with alternative fuels: Wood, water, and wastepaper.

The residents of Burlington deserve special congratulations, because they have become, to the best of my knowledge, the first community in the country to take the initiative to explore alternatives to the conventional fossil fuels upon which we all have become deplorably dependent. I laud the community's resolve to seek alternative energy resources, and hope that communities in other States will have the courage to join with Burlington in shaping a better destiny for us all.

Mr. President, I ask to have the following article printed in the RECORD. It appeared in the April 2, 1978, Washington Post.

The article follows:

VERMONT TOWN HARVESTS WOOD CHIPS TO EASE ENERGY CRUNCH

(By Lee Lescaze)

BURLINGTON, VT.—Each day, about an acre of Gordon Fletcher's birch and pine woods is ground into 100 tons of matchbook-size chips and trucked off to provide electric power for Burlington.

Fletcher's trees are feeding a utility that proclaims itself the first in the nation to sell electricity generated from wood chips, but Burlington's planners see them as only the beginning of a long line of "chip harvesters" like the red machine on Fletcher's farm that will turn whole trees into chips in a few seconds.

This month, Burlington's traditionally tight-fisted voters gave 2-to-1 approval to a $40 million bond proposal for a large new generating plant that will keep chip harvesters grinding through Vermont's woods at a rate of about 470,000 tons of chips a year.

The coal strike, protests and fears that have stymied development of several New England nuclear power plants, the hazards of relying on imported oil and the success of the wood chip experiment begun here last fall all contributed to the bond proposal's overwhelming approval, Robert Young, general manager of the municipal electric company, said.

Heating oil cost 12 cents a gallon in 1972 and is 40 cents today. Canadian natural gas which was available for 40 cents per thousand cubic feet now costs six times as much.

It takes three times as much wood as coal to generate the same amount of heat, but at $12 a ton for delivered chips, wood is already the cheapest fuel available to Burlington Electric. Young expects wood chips to provide even a greater savings as costs of other fuels rise.

Young is also confident that there is enough wood in the Burlington region to feed the proposed new generating plant without damaging the forests.

For Young, whose Burlington Electric Department also won approval of bond proposals for a hydroelectric project and a facility to burn trash in order to produce hot water, energy-poor Vermont's predicament had become clear.

"We've got to do something for ourselves and the only resources we have are wood, water and trash," Young said. Even with the new projects, Burlington will be dependent on coal or nuclear energy or both for its base load of power but it will be more self-sufficient than it is now.

In 1972, Burlington Electric paid $11.92 a ton for coal delivered to its J. Edward Moran plant on the edge of Lake Champlain. Recently, it has paid more than $50 a ton, Young said.

According to a survey done for Burlington by the Washington firm Henningson, Durham & Richardson, there is enough annual wood growth within about 75 miles of Burlington to stoke the proposed 50-megawatt generator and its estimated annual consumption of 470,000 tons indefinitely.

Other power producers with larger needs have looked at wood chips and turned away in dismay. Gordon McKenny of the Public Service Co. of New Hampshire said studies indicated that to obtain from wood the 1,150 megawatts the company expects from its much-protested Seabrook nuclear plant it would need: 204 truckloads of wood per hour, or a truck unloading every 17.6 seconds and in 7.8 years would denude New Hampshire of trees.

By 1870, after generations of logging, Vermont was 42 percent forested. But as people left the land and farms were abandoned in this century, trees grew back until now more than 76 percent of the state is wooded—but it is not the same quality forest that the settlers found.

A 1973 forest survey discovered that nearly 30 percent of Vermont's trees over five inches in diameter are commercially undesirable because they are rotting, diseased, misshapen or of a species not suited for lumber.

When the chip harvesters work in hardwood forests, whether private or state-owned, Young said, they will follow the directions of foresters and cut only those trees whose absence will aid the forest.

Gordon Fletcher, however, wants all his trees cleared to reclaim what once were fields. Before the chip harvester came to his farm, Fletcher was paying men to clear an acre or two of his land each year.

Now, he gets paid 40 cents a ton for his previously unmarketable trees, but more important, he gets an acre cleared every day.

The trees are snipped off close to the ground by giant clippers mounted on a large-wheeled vehicle. Another machine grabs a bundle of them and drags them from the woods to the clearing where the whole trees are taken in at one end of the chip harvester and chips are blown out the other as a snow blower blows out snow.

The chips fly into trailers each of which holds more than 20 tons. They are driven to the Moran plant where a huge pile of coal now shares yard space with two smaller piles of chips.

Burlington Electric converted one of the Moran plant's three burners to take chips last fall. Plant Superintendent Thomas Carr designed and executed the conversion for $25,000. "That's less than we could've paid for a feasibility study that I could put on my shelf," Young said.

Three parts chips are burned with one part Number 2 heating oil to increase their heat generating capacity. However, a mixture of one-quarter oil is a saving for Burlington Electric, which has to mix 55 percent oil with 45 percent coal to meet state air quality standards when it burns coal. The chips cost about 2.3 cents a kilowatt-hour against about 3 cents a kilowatt-hour for the coal mixture, Young said.

"I don't think that small utilities should be gamblers," Young said. He stressed that the technology of wood chip burning is tested. A number of pulp and paper plants have used their waste wood to generate power. The Weyerhaeuser plant at Longview, Wash., consumes almost exactly the 1,200–1,500 tons a day Burlington will need.

The total cost of the wood chip plant which Burlington hopes will open in 1982 will be almost $80 million.

Within a month, Young and other Burlington officials will visit Washington to knock on some doors. Young knows that Washington is interested in alternate energy projects and is funding many experiments.

"I'm hoping what we're doing will have a little appeal in Washington," he said.●

THE NATIONAL FARM COALITION ON FOREIGN TRADE POLICY

● Mr. CHURCH. Mr. President, the National Farm Coalition, an ad hoc group of 36 general commodity and cooperative organizations from across the Nation, met in Washington, D.C., on March 15, 1978. The group reviewed the general farm situation and formulated a paper on foreign trade policy.

I believe that the coalition's paper makes good sense. In a time when our Nation's trade deficit is rapidly increasing and our farmers are caught in a vicious price squeeze, our foreign trade policy is of critical importance.

A vigorous effort must be made by U.S. negotiators to break down the barriers to world trade during the ongoing GATT multilateral trade negotiations and to obtain the greatest possible benefits for U.S. agriculture.

Mr. President, I commend this paper to my colleagues and I ask that it be printed in the RECORD, along with a list of the members of the National Farm Coalition.

The material follows:

STATEMENT OF NATIONAL FARM COALITION ON FOREIGN TRADE POLICY

American agricultural interests are becoming increasingly concerned about the rising trend toward support of trade restrictive policies both here and abroad. Such protectionist attitudes threaten the success of the current round of GATT trade negotiations in the short run and in the long run could seriously restrict U.S. farm exports, the expansion of which is so essential to the health of both U.S. agriculture and the U.S. economy.

A liberal foreign trade policy is not only a must for agriculture, it is a must for America. Such a policy does not require the U.S. to tolerate trading practices that compete unfairly with U.S. products both here and in third countries. We must continue to protect ourselves against trade-distorting practices such as, a matter of particular concern, foreign export subsidies and against products that are produced under health, grade, or environmental standards that are much lower than are tolerated here. However, we must be careful to impose and administer such legitimate control measures in such a way as to maintain the central thrust of a liberal trade policy.

Agriculture is America's largest and most important industry. Farmers buy annually about $80 billion worth of inputs to produce an output of about $100 billion. Over 15 million jobs are involved in the entire food and fiber complex which finds its base in agriculture.

In 1977 the value of farm exports exceeded the value of agricultural imports in the U.S. by about $10.5 billion. The total farm products exported had a value of $24 billion—the equivalent of about 25 percent of cash receipts from farm marketings. Farm exports are therefore of great financial value to farmers and to the national economy by paying for a large portion of our imported energy. For this favorable economic relationship to continue, we shall need an even greater emphasis on agricultural exports unencumbered by the backlash of trade restrictive policies both here and abroad.

We applaud the efforts of our chief negotiator, Robert Strauss, to maximize our opportunities for agricultural exports, through GATT and other special negotiations. The strong encouragement and assistance he has had from many Congressional leaders, from Secretary of Agriculture Bergland and from other key Administration trade leaders have greatly assisted his commendable activities toward reducing Japanese trade barriers. He deserves great credit for dealing with some very serious U.S. import problems in ways which have not invited serious retaliations or a wave of extreme international protectionist moves which could disrupt the international trading system and bring on world economic chaos.

We urge that a maximum effort be made by U.S. negotiators, with strong support from Congress, to obtain the greatest possible benefits for U.S. agriculture from the ongoing GATT Multilateral Trade Negotiations. In this effort, it is essential that agricultural negotiations be closely linked with all other negotiations in the international arena and that the interests of U.S. farmers and of agribusiness be fully considered in every trade policy action taken by our government.

Special attention should be directed toward the achievement of an export subsidy code which can benefit all our trading interests, agricultural and industrial alike. And while special discussions can be necessary for agricultural problems, such as the International Wheat Agreement talks outside of GATT, they must not be allowed to delay agricultural progress or to isolate agriculture at the stage of negotiations when the total package's benefits and costs must be balanced.

In this regard, it is vital that our U.S. industrial community and our national leadership keep in mind that we have U.S. concessions outside of the trade area which can be made in payment for gains which must be compensated for. President Carter's recent and most beneficial trip to France, with political assistance for French Premier Giscard d'Estaing and further assurance of military support for Western Europe, was a dramatic illustration of this capability.

The trade negotiations which are building toward a climax in Geneva at this very moment may represent the best opportunity the world will have for many years to frustrate the growth of new and damaging trade barriers and to remove some of the existing barriers. The re-emergence of protectionist sentiment is seriously threatening the success of this effort in which the U.S. economy, and particularly U.S. agriculture, has such an enormous stake. The unmatched efficiency of U.S. agriculture makes it possible for great gains to be obtained from a freer flow of trade in farm products, the benefits of which will be enjoyed by all Americans. We must not let this opportunity slip away.

AMERICAN ACADEMY OF PEDIATRICS PARTICIPATION IN THE HEALTH PLANNING PROCESS

● Mr. CRANSTON. Mr. President, I wish to take this opportunity to bring to the attention of the Senate, on behalf of the American Academy of Pediatrics, recent developments in the area of health planning in which the academy has been involved.

The American Academy of Pediatrics prides itself on its response to the request in Public Law 93–641, the National Health Planning and Resources Development Act of 1974, for provider participation in the development of health systems plans, annual implementation plans, and State health plans. The academy feels that a program information letter from Harry P. Cain, II, Director, Bureau of Health Planning and Resources Development, Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, recognizes contributions the academy can make to the planning process. The academy, through its president, Dr. Saul J. Robinson, a distinguished Californian, has asked me to relay to the Members of the Senate its eagerness to offer the academy's services and resources for use in future health-planning efforts.

Mr. President, I ask that the program information letter written by Mr. Cain be printed in the RECORD.

The material follows:

HYATTSVILLE, MD.,
December 21, 1977.

To: Health Systems Agencies, State Health Planning and Development Agencies, Statewide Health Coordinating Councils.
Subject: Child Health Care Planning.

Recently some of my staff and I met with representatives of the American Academy of Pediatrics (AAP) regarding child health care considerations in the development of Health Systems Plans and Annual Implementation Plans. The purpose of this program information letter is to acquaint you with the AAP's interest in working with us in implementing the health planning program.

In response to the National Health Planning and Resources Development Act, the Academy developed two documents for its member AAP Chapters concerned with child health planning:

"A Handbook on Child Health Planning for AAP Chapters"

"A Sample Child Health Plan for AAP Chapters"

These documents have been disseminated to the individual AAP Chapters throughout the country. AAP officials stated that they believe that most of their Chapters will want to participate in planning for child health services and that the Chapters may be willing to make these documents available to the HSAs. They may be willing to help in other ways as well; for example, they can serve as a resource for data and information on child health in their area.

We have reviewed the two documents and while they do not conform in their entirety to our guidance on plan development, (nonquantifiable goals are used), and while many may disagree with some recommendations, we think you may well find the documents useful. We also encourage you to take advantage of the AAP's interest in plan development activities.

The Academy provided us with a list of the names and addresses of each AAP Chapter Chairman. A copy is enclosed for your reference.

Finally, I wish to take this opportunity to remind you that health plans must be responsive to the unique needs of the residents of the area for which the plans are developed. In providing guidance on this requirement, the Bureau has made every effort to ensure that planning agencies have the flexibility required to develop plans which respond to local or State priorities and needs. When identifying the unique needs of your area, I urge you to consider the special needs of children. I am sure we all agree that this population subgroup's health status and health service requirements deserve careful thought.

MERIT SELECTION—THE PRESIDENT'S BROKEN PROMISE

● Mr. LUGAR. Mr. President, in one of the most exhilarating and often made promises of the 1976 campaign, President Carter proclaimed, "All judges and prosecutors should be appointed strictly on the basis of merit, without any consideration of political aspects or influences." Americans were genuinely excited by this pledge to remove political patronage from the selection of Federal judicial officers.

Unfortunately, soon after the President's inauguration, campaign rhetoric and Presidential performance parted company. According to the December 5, 1977 issue of Time magazine, President Carter had appointed 86 U.S. judges and attorneys before December 1, 1977. Of these 86 appointees, all except one were Democrats.

The President's policy in regard to this issue has been best explained by Attorney General Griffin Bell. On May 26, 1977, Judge Bell responded to a question about the firing of Detroit U.S. Attorney Philip Van Dam by stating:

Well, I'd say the main reason (Van Dam was fired) was we had an election last November and the Democrats won.

More recently in explaining why another U.S. attorney was being replaced, the Attorney General explained:

Well, we have two parties. The ins are the Democrats.

Indeed, the record is clear. No public relations gimmickry or rewriting of 1976 campaign history can absolve the President from his obvious use of political considerations in selecting these important judicial officers.

On Wednesday, March 22, 1978, the Christian Science Monitor published a most perceptive column by Roscoe Drummond entitled "Marstongate." I take this opportunity to commend Roscoe Drummond for his fine presentation, and I ask that this article be printed in the RECORD.

The editorial follows:

MARSTONGATE

(By Roscoe Drummond)

WASHINGTON.—Every time President Carter thinks he has the Marston affair safely buried under a rock in the Rose Garden, little worms crawl out from under and raise new doubts.

I do not imply that there is any prospect whatsoever that the President will reverse course and admit that, in firing U.S. attorney David Marston in Philadelphia not on merit but because he was a Republican, he thereby did violence to one of his more appealing campaign promises. His promise was that, if he was elected, all federal prosecutors would be selected strictly on the basis of merit and without any political considerations.

Past presidents have done it politically. The difference is that Mr. Carter promised that, if elected, he wouldn't do it any more. He was elected. He did it some more.

Attorney General Griffin Bell reportedly assured a powerful Southern Republican senator that selection by merit would apply to removing federal prosecutors exactly as it would apply to naming the new prosecutors. Mr. Marston had a meritorious record of effective prosecutions, achieving guilty verdicts on corrupt Democrats and Republicans.

Mr. Marston was fired by the Attorney General, at the direction of President Carter, after it was known that Democratic Representative Joshua Eilberg of Pennsylvania was involved in a Marston investigation and after he had appealed directly to the President to get that man out of there. Mr. Eilberg apparently didn't care who replaced Marston.

Now come the new worms of doubt which are crawling to the surface. They have to do with a worse offense.

The real offense in Watergate was not the break-in, but the subsequent cover-up. It is now becoming evident that much of the maneuvering by the White House and the Justice Department to make the Marston case look better doesn't look much different from the Nixon stonewalling. Examples:

In Marstongate the Justice Department did its own investigating and quickly cleared itself—and the President—of any wrongdoing. That's what President Nixon wanted to do but they wouldn't let him.

In Marstongate the Justice Department first withheld and then finally released, upon congressional demand, parts of an affidavit—previously exercised—prepared by Marston as long as Jan. 16 reporting that Marston considered Eilberg and Rep. Daniel Flood, also of Pennsylvania, "certain to be indicted."

In Marstongate top Justice Department officials seemed to be sure that the White House would want to erect a screen around testimony from those who knew Marston was doing a good job in Philadelphia and should on merit be kept on the job so as not to slow the momentum behind prosecutions in progress and in prospect. Hence the President's men collaborated in deleting from a key affidavit a sworn statement by an FBI agent that Marston was doing an excellent job and that it was important to retain him.

The Washington Post reported: "Deletions were made in several of the affidavits, Justice officials said, so the department wouldn't be confirming that Eilberg, in fact, later did become a subject of a criminal investigation."

The effect of these distorting deletions—this erasing from affidavits—was to protect the administration from having to reveal pro-Marston information.

In Watergate the Nixon White House erased 18 minutes of a tape recording which could have been damaging.

The reason it is useful to get all the Marston scandal into the open is this: If the President won't take partisan politics out of law enforcement appointees, Congress may be persuaded to do so if public opinion demands it.●

ENERGY INDEPENDENCE CAN BE ASSURED IF CONGRESS ACTS AND THERE IS A NATIONAL COMMITMENT OF THE AMERICAN PEOPLE

● Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. President, I was gratified to observe last week that the Senate and House conferees had their first public meeting of the 2d session of the 95th Congress. Their discussions on natural gas pricing and the emerging points of possible compromise exchanged gave me new hope that soon the Nation might become more energy independent. I urge my Senate colleagues, and all of us, to continue diligent efforts toward final resolution on a national energy plan.

Last Saturday, April 1, I had the privilege to participate in the awards banquet for the American Institute of Mining & Metallurgical Engineering at West Virginia University, with many other Mountaineers keenly aware of the new attitudes which are emerging with regard to production and utiliation of our fossil and other domestic energy supplies.

I told this group of 400 persons that recently I noticed, in an issue of the WVU Alumni Quarterly, the replicas of the school mascot and State symbol—the Mountaineer—are being made from coal. This is truly a fitting substance from which to construct an image which reflects the proud and dignified heritage of the State, for West Virginia perhaps more than any other area of our Nation, relies on is mineral resources for its economic base.

Mr. President, it is not surprising that both the Federal Government and private industry are continuing to gain confidence in the coal and energy-related research capacities of the West Virginia University faculty, staff, and students. That confidence is refletced in the fact that during 1977, WVU received $9.3 million in coal and other energy research grants. The Federal Government awarded $7.9 million of the total, along with $751,000 from State government. The increase in energy-related grants from the private sector rose from about $98,000 in 1974–75 to $591,000 in 1976–77.

Coal research projects will continue to be a major thrust of university activity. More utilities and industries will have to use greater amounts of coal for power and heating requirements as is now being used, for example, in the engineering sciences building on the Evansdale campus of WVU, highlighting Appalachian coal as it continues to assume increasing importance as a major domestic source of energy.

Coupled with coal, however, are other less prevalent but significant energy sources in West Virginia still waiting to be tapped or discovered. Currently, faculty and students of the College of Mineral and Energy Resources at WVU are exploring the possibilities of cultivating geothermal energy in Appalachian formations that might yield the equivalent of 35 trillion barrels of crude oil in the future. Other members of the staff are looking at methods for enhanced oil recovery from known West Virginia fields which still hold 2 billion barrels of oil.

While wrestling with these problems other staff from WVU's Department of Aerospace Engineering are laboring on questions of how to extract from the wind on an economic basis, realizing that energy from this source at any given moment is estimated to be at least 54 times the world's total energy requirements. It is clear, from these efforts being made at West Virginia University that even without a formal energy program, Americans are well on their way to providing answers which will solve some of our energy problems.

Over the last 2 months, I have read many articles and editorials outlining the lack of congressional movement on the creation of a national energy policy. Actually the lack of movement has been on natural gas pricing and tax provisions of the bill. In action last year Congress did enact the Surface Mining Control and Reclamation Act of 1977 and early this year passed black lung benefits legislation. I have long recognized that to achieve and maintain high levels of coal production, the Federal Government must adopt a coal policy which was easily understood and implemented. With the grueling coal strike now behind us, I feel these two legislative actions will begin to coordinate national policies on mine health and safety, surface mine reclamation and environmental quality. The Reclamation Act also provides universities in West Virginia and other States with the opportunity to apply and become involved in the coal research laboratory program (title 8) of that law.

In anticipation of Federal legislative action on energy significant progress is being made in private industry which will lead to decreases in energy imports.

Conversion of utilities and industry from gas and oil has increased. The National Coal Association says hundreds of utilities have shifted back to coal in the past 2 years, and 241 new coal boilers are now on the drawing boards. Boiler industry officials report not one oil or gas-fired boiler has been ordered since late 1975.

New exploration for energy has increased steadily. Industry statistics show operation of new drilling rigs at historically high rates, and recent increases in natural gas prices have spurred new exploration.

The results of all this have been fairly dramatic. While the Nation's economy has grown by some 13 percent since 1973, demand for petroleum has increased only at about half that pace—7.1 percent. On a day-to-day basis petroleum demand now is running at about 17.5 million barrels a day, on a seasonally adjusted basis—virtually unchanged from its levels in 1973.

These initiatives are encouraging and I know congressional action not apathy have paved the way for these efforts. I also know, however, there is still definite value in passing a major energy blueprint to end uncertainty over what exactly the Government will require from industry and consumers, and to negate, as much as possible our dependence on foreign energy resources.

Mr. President, as I indicated earlier energy conferees of the House and Senate are still trying to reach agreement on deregulation, a definition of new gas and whether the Federal Government will be able to allocate intrastate supplies under emergency situations. Many tax portions of the bill will depend on decisions reached on natural gas pricing. The important point, however, is this: Three important parts of the energy bill have tentatively been agreed to—conservation, utility rate reform, and of most importance to West Virginia—coal conversion.

Conference reports on these sections, passed by the Senate as separate pieces of legislation are essentially complete. Perhaps, if deadlock continues on natural gas pricing and taxes the Congress should be best advised to move ahead and pass these provisions, rather than place everything in stalemate.

Why? Coal represents 90 percent of the Nation's total fossil fuel reserves. Yet, it currently supplies only 18 percent of our energy needs. The Natural Gas and Petroleum Conservation and Coal Utilization Act, as agreed to by the energy conferees, establishes part of the policy necessary to make widespread coal use a reality and encourages powerplants and industrial plants to switch from oil and gas to coal. I believe that at least 80 percent of the provisions in the conference version of the coal conversion bill were included in S. 273 which I introduced on January 14, 1977, under the same title. Of course, this is not our first effort on increasing coal utilization—we have worked on these issues for many years. For example, on October 18, 1973, I introduced along with Senators JACKSON and MAGNUSON S. 2589, which eventually became the framework of the Energy Supply and Environmental Coordination Act of 1974.

The coal conversion portion of the energy bill is quite complex, containing numerous exemptions for cases in which conversion would be uneconomical, technically impractical or would violate environmental requirements. The bill does not directly order the use of coal. Rather, it forbids the use of petroleum and natural gas, thus leaving industry the choice of picking another fuel source. Besides coal, a plant could use municipal waste or wood chips. Synthetic fuel from coal not mixed with natural gas could also be used.

Another constructive provision of the coal conversion legislation would establish an $800 million loan program for existing powerplants to buy pollution control equipment. The bill would also provide financial assistance to areas affected by increased coal or uranium production processing and transportation totaling $180 million over a 2-year period. Loan guarantees for coal preparation facilities to reduce the sulfur content of coal and Presidential power to allocate the use of coal during emergency situations are also included.

We have faced a crossroads in the energy market before in this country. In the 1850's coal oil (kerosene) developed, rapidly replacing the runaway costs of whale oil which previously had dominated the residential illumination market. Barely had coal oil achieved its success when it was driven out by a new fuel, petroleum. By 1863, coal oil refineries had shifted to crude oil.

Today in the energy market we are at the point where petroleum resources will again give way in part to coal, synthetic fuels from coal, local hydropower generation from small dams, and other energy alternatives. The point is this—we must not create another uncertainty to accompany that natural scarcity of oil and gas by being unclear and indecisive on Government policy regarding energy issues on which agreement has already been reached.

The conference agreements on coal, energy conservation, and electric rate reform are legitimate compromises which can aid this Nation in becoming one that is energy independent again. If we cannot reach consensus on natural gas pricing and taxes than I feel we should take a long, hard look at seeing that these other energy measures are enacted.

Since the introduction of national energy legislation last April, I have emphasized the lack of attention given to energy development of new synthetic and coal technologies in the President's proposal. The Federal investment of $12.5 billion we are pledging for a 1-billion-barrel strategic reserve system could be redirected toward the construction of coal gasification facilities capable of producing the equivalent of 1 million barrels of oil per day for at least 20 years.

By subsidizing new energy supplies and technologies for the differential cost between market prices (for example, of imported oil) and domestic alternatives, we can foster even greater energy supplies from domestic sources. It would be in the national interest to consider financial incentives as a means to stimulate domestic energy alternatives to oil imports from traditional and unconventional sources, such as coal gasification and liquefaction, solvent refined coal, and oil shale.

Tax revenues raised from energy usage should be directed to the development of new energy supplies; otherwise after the high prices have been paid, we will be no better off than now from the standpoint of energy self-sufficiency.

Reacting to these statements, and others, the Department of Energy is developing what they term a "phase two" energy plan which will emphasize Federal subsidies for development of synthetic oil and natural gas from coal and oil shale, which should be finalized and sent to Congress during the next month or two.

Attention to our environment, one of my main concerns as chairman of the Environment and Public Works Committee, requires bringing these issues into the energy planning process. I have heard it stated that in the future we will either be "breathing clean air in the dark, or choking our way through the light." Environmental damage cannot be altogether avoided in obtaining and using energy. Energy policy, however, should be extremely sensitive to activities that may damage the environment for decades or generations to come. I firmly believe that both legislative and executive proposals on vital issues such as coal conversion technologies should be built with safeguards for retention of environmental quality, rather than considering these areas as an afterthought.

Once the substance of new technologies are developed by industry and university research efforts we must assure they are not smothered by unnecessary procedural requirements. Some of the pitfalls we must try and avoid are:

Too many detailed and lengthy provisions into law;

Government agencies responsible for carrying out these statutes being understaffed (examples: strip mining function in the Department of Interior and toxic substances in the Environmental Protection Agency) which then establishes a regulatory jurisdiction beyond the agency's ability to discharge them. This, in turn, will eventually create a tremendous backlog of court cases;

Inadequate delegation of responsibility to regional and division Federal staff; and Allowing citizen involvement at the local level to balloon into nothing more than elaborate stall tactics, again causing an overloading of the judiciary system.

Some individuals believe environmental protection should be pursued above all other national goals. Others advocate growth and production as the lone objective. But I emphasize that either of these extremes would impose excessive societal costs on our country—costs which are neither desirable nor necessary.

We can have a clean and healthy society at the same time as we have a productive society. But first we must agree that the issues surrounding growth and environmental quality are reconcilable. The compatibility of coal and the environment are some of the questions being examined by employees of the Department of Energy at the Morgantown Research Center.

Unlike foreign policy, elements of economic policy, or national defense, national energy policy cannot be made, much less implemented, solely by our elected leaders. It must be determined by the man in the street, by the university professor and the student, and by those working in industry. It requires no less than a true consensus among our individual citizens, or it will not work.

Why is energy so different from these other policy questions? The answer lies in how and by whom such policy decisions are implemented. Foreign policy is carried out largely by the President and diplomatic corps, all of which are part of the Federal Government. Defense policy is carried out by our military services, which are under the direct control of the President and Congress. Monetary policy is carried out largely by the Federal Reserve Board, which is an agency of the Federal Government. Energy policy, on the other hand, can be carried out only by individual citizens, groups, and institutions in the private sector who are under no one's control but their own.

Mr. President, the point is that energy and energy policy affect people so directly, and in turn are so directly affected by them that everyone is involved. Everyone must participate, like it or not. And only those policy decisions on which everyone can finally agree will ultimately be carried out and incorporated into a true national energy policy. I think it is also true that groups such as the College of Minerals and Energy Resources at West Virginia University and other State institutions of higher learning will continue research which will accent America's need for energy resources of every description—not competition between those resources. Mixed powdered coal for roads, coal gasification processes for plants and homes, liquefied coal or alcohol to substitute for gasoline, solar energy, and others must all contribute, with gas and oil, to the final product—a strong United States for future generations.●

THE LABOR REFORM BILL

● Mr. HELMS. Mr. President, the so-called labor reform bill presently before the Congress has been nicknamed by some as "J. P. Stevens bill." This apparently is in reference to the inability of the Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union to organize the J. P. Stevens Co., over the past 15 years. One of the purposes of the so-called labor reform bill is to make it easier for unions to organize plants and factories which contain a majority of those not wishing to be represented by a union.

It would not be appropriate for me to take sides in the dispute between J. P. Stevens and the Textile Union. That is a matter properly left to the courts. However, one cannot ignore the vicious and distorted propaganda campain generated by the labor bosses against the J. P. Stevens Co. By the daily hoisting of inaccuracies into the public view, big labor apparrently intends to create a climate favorable for the passage of the so-called labor reform bill.

Fortunately, the Wall Street Journal has recently published two excellent editorials concerning the J. P. Stevens controversy which put the matter in a better perspective. It is important that these editorials be read by those who have never had an opportunity to examine the facts of the dispute, and who have heard only the big union propaganda.

Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that two editorials appearing in the March 24 and March 31 editions of the Wall Street Journal be printed in the RECORD at the conclusion of my remarks.

The editorials follow:

LABOR'S BLACKLIST

It is not often that we stick our nose into a strictly private conflict between management and labor. Especially when the slugging match goes back 15 years. We just assume that sooner or later one party or the other will throw in the towel or both sides will be so black and blue that they'll come to a gasping compromise.

But the beef between the Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union and J. P. Stevens & Co., which dates to at least 1963, has gotten out of hand. The union has essentially lost its long fight to organize Stevens. Most of the 44,000 workers of Stevens' 83 plants through the South have made it painfully clear that they do not want to be represented by Amalgamated. Over the years the union has tried elections in the 12 likeliest locations and lost all but one, at Roanoke Rapids, N.C., which voted union 1,685 to 1,448 in 1974.

The union has lost a fortune in its long drive, and its frustration and bitterness are not hard to understand. But we can't sympathize with the union's last-ditch tactics. Because Stevens can't be beaten in a fair and square stand-up fight, Amalgamated has now resorted to terrorizing businessmen who do business with Stevens. The object is to starve Stevens into submission by isolating it from the rest of the business and financial community.

The tactic isn't likely to achieve the union's goals, but it is having dramatic short-term effects. Manufacturers Hanover Corp., threatened by the union with having union pension funds yanked out of the bank, has parted instead with two directors associated with Stevens. They are James D. Finley, chairman and chief executive of the textile firm and David W. Mitchell, a Stevens director who also is chairman and chief executive of Avon Products Inc.

Then it was Avon's turn, yanking Mr. Mitchell off Stevens' board after the textile union threatened a boycott of Avon products, on top of its unsuccessful boycott of Stevens' products. A string of labor leaders, politicians and clergymen—including a number of Catholic bishops—openly advocate the severing of all corporate ties to Stevens' board. Unlike a straightforward boycott, a la Cesar Chavez and his grapes, the textile union tactic concentrates wrath not on inanimate products but on human beings.

And it is all mindless fury by now. There is no denying that Stevens has been a tough union foe but union claims that the company does not fight fair are more dubious. It's true that over the last 15 years the union has been able to make unfair labor practice charges against Stevens stick 12 times. On the other hand, hundreds of its complaints have been dismissed. Considering that the National Labor Relations Board is scarcely antiunion, this seems to us the record of a hard, tough fight, not the record of a rogue employer. Even the 12 successful complaints seem to have little to do with the union's inability to win elections.

Clearly, labor's problems with J. P. Stevens, the Southern textile industry and the South in general go well beyond the toughness and intransigence of a single corporate management. The textile industry is subject to fierce international competition. That's the reason it fled to the South from the North in search of lower costs. Many Southern workers apparently think that management is right when it claims that unions can't do much for them but price them out of a job and make more work for the Taiwanese.

It is significant that although the ACTWU won the Roanoke Rapids election in 1974, no contract has yet been negotiated nor has the union called a strike. This could be called another sign of Stevens' toughness, but it also suggests that the union itself recognizes a fundamental weakness in its economic position.

Blackmailing Manny Hanny and Avon won't cure that. Nor will the "labor reform" bill the AFL–CIO is trying to push through Congress as a new weapon for organizing the South, even though it will put dubious new strictures on management. It will be illegal, for example, to fire a worker who is organizing other workers on company time.

Labor's problems are serious. But it will solve them sooner by looking inward, not by trying to threaten individual corporate directors with the novel weapon of the secondary blacklist.

[From the Wall Street Journal, Mar. 31, 1978]

COMING ATTRACTIONS, 1984

As we now are following with renewed interest the 15-year campaign of the textile union to organize J. P. Stevens Co., the latest development is especially absorbing. A National Labor Relations administrative law judge—Joel Harmatz—has declared the union to be the bargaining agent for 1,000 employes at Stevens' plants and warehouses in Wallace, N.C., even though a majority of the employes there voted against the union in a 1975 election.

We have examined Mr. Harmatz's decision and can report what has been going on. It will make particularly interesting reading since the House just passed the AFL–CIO's Labor Reform Bill, which gives union organizers new rights and further restricts what employers can do to fight back.

In the fall of 1974, the Amalgamated Clothing and Textile Workers Union successfully collected authorization cards from about half of the employes at the Wallace complex, the cards authorizing an NLRB election to determine whether or not a majority desired representation by the ACTWU.

On Feb. 19, 1975, 404 workers cast ballots for the union and 540 cast ballots against the union.

The ACTWU thereupon charged Stevens with unfair conduct leading up to the election, asked that the vote be disregarded and that it be declared the bargaining agent. After reviewing the charges, Mr. Harmatz deemed the authorization cards "a more reliable measure of employe choice than the results of the Feb. 19, 1975 election." He ordered Stevens to pay all the costs of litigation including the expenses of the union.

What did Stevens did that was so grossly unfair as to invalidate a secret-ballot election and elevate in its place a mere petition?

First, Stevens interfered with union distribution of campaign literature the day before the election. In the weeks preceding the election, the union distributed its literature outside the plant gate and via mail and in person at the homes of the workers. On Feb. 18, the union abruptly switched tactics and began handing out literature inside the plant. Supervisors ordered the workers to cease. In the hearings, Stevens conceded that the workers should not have been stopped as long as they were in nonwork areas, but that the supervisors were not aware of this fine point in labor law and were reacting to the abrupt change in the union's practice (which almost seemed designed to elicit a technical violation).

Second, Stevens has a profit-sharing plan for its employes. In 1974 when the stock market hit bottom, the value of the invested funds sank with it and employes were alarmed. One of Stevens' competitors, Burlington Industries, had the same problem. On September 19, 1974, Burlington announced a revision of its profit-sharing plan to give employes some protection against market fluctuations. On January 17, 1975, Stevens followed suit. The union charged dirty pool, saying Stevens, unlike Burlington, did not have the interests of the workers at heart, only removing a grievance that would help the union win the election.

Third, on Sept. 30, 1974, 134 workers at the Wallace plant were laid off because of slack, drawing unemployment compensation of $68 per week. If they had been laid off the next day, Oct. 1, they would have drawn $90 per week because of a change then taking place in North Carolina law. Stevens, having checked with the state bureaucracy, though the workers would get the new, higher rate. It tried to clear up the misunderstanding, but the state refused to budge. On Feb. 11, 1975, Stevens said it would pay them the difference itself. Again, dirty pool, said the ACTWU and administrative law Judge Harmatz.

In these violations Mr. Harmatz finds a "pattern of unlawful conduct." He was horrified, "No end appears to this unrelenting effort to exhaust the resources of this union in the hope that eventually it will be left with no alternative other than complete withdrawal." And because of the inability of the union to distribute literature inside the plant, because of a change in profit sharing and because of extra payments to the unemployed, it seems, 540 workers were so confused their ballots can't be counted.

For Mr. Harmatz's remedy is not to order a new election, but simply to declare the losers the winners. The union did get about half of the workers to sign authorization cards, and he declares this the "more reliable measure of employe choice." No matter that the cards are often sold as simply election petition. No matter that they are gathered face to face, maybe or maybe not by smiling union organizers in dark alleys. If you signed a card for an election to get the organizer off your back, it counts as a vote for the union. But it does not count if you vote against the union by secret ballot.

George Orwell couldn't have dreamed up a better example of Doublethink. 1884, here we come.●

RHODESIA

● Mr. HATCH. Mr. President, on February 22 Senator DOLE, Senator GARN, and I sent a letter to President Carter expressing concern over the then recent remarks that had been made by Ambassador Young and other officials in the administration concerning the "Salisbury Settlement" for the Rhodesian problem. At that time we indicated that we were concerned over administration statements that could be deleterious to the chances of the settlement reaching its fruition. We called upon the President to permit the people of Rhodesia, both black and white, to try and arrive at a peaceful solution to the problem of majority rule.

On March 22 I received a reply to this letter and at that time the administration appeared to be heading in the direction that we had suggested in our letter of the previous month. Their response quoted President Carter as stating:

We have not rejected the individual component parts of the so-called internal settlement plan. To the extent that they are consistent with the overall Anglo-American plan provisions, they are a step in the right direction.

At this time I took heart that the world might eventually see a peaceful conclusion to the unrest that has dominated this African nation.

Mr. President, the news of the past weekend has brought home to me the fact that such is not to be the case. President Carter's denouncement of the settlement has dealt that initiative a grievous blow. Once again the administration has failed to recognize the issue and what is most beneficial to the United States. By recognizing the leaders of the guerrilla groups, the Patriotic Front, the United States has given them the incentive to continue to wage this brutal war against the people who desire to live in peace. Robert Mugabe and Joshua Nkomo have vowed to continue the fight until they have control of the government.

However, had this settlement been given the support of the United States, or at the very least been permitted to develop independent of U.S. interference, the people of Rhodesia might well have decided that to live in peace is better than war and the recruits that these guerrilla leaders seek might have been a little slower in coming forward. Now with the United States apparently legitimizing their cause, it will be much easier for them to continue to wage their war.

What will the United States gain by supporting these men? As I view the situation, we have nothing to gain, and everything to lose. The Patriotic Front bases its operations out of Marxist nations, supported by the Soviet Union. They are tied to the Communists and allowing them to usurp the reigns of government would be tantamount to creating a new Communist state in southern Africa.

In yesterday's Washington Post the Evans and Novak column dealt with this topic in an excellent manner. In their column they indicate that the administration is using the rationale that to support anything but the guerrillas would be an open invitation for Soviet-Cuban intervention. It is this fear of Soviet intervention through their puppet army, the Cubans, that has forced the administration to once again demonstrate a "knee-jerk" response to the Soviet wishes. As I have stated before on the floor of the Senate, the Carter administration seems hellbent on continuing a foreign policy that is centered around a policy of avoiding a confrontation with the Soviet Union at all costs, even the cost of freedom for the people of Rhodesia.

Mr. President, I call on the Carter administration to take a stand for the freedoms of people around the world. Let us deal with the moderates in Rhodesia, the men who see the wisdom of a settlement through the ballot box and not by the force of a gun barrel. These are men who are committed to the Western alliance. These are men who truly want peace and are willing to take the necessary steps to reach this goal. The administration owes it to the people of Rhodesia to allow them to work out their problems in a peaceful manner.

Mr. President, I submit the Evans and Novak column from the Washington Post of April 3 for the RECORD.

The article follows:

A DEAD END ON RHODESIA?

(By Rowland Evans and Robert Novak)

The newest rationale behind Carter administration preference for Soviet-supplied guerrillas instead of pro-Western moderates to run Rhodesia is fear of yet another Cuban military operation, a rationale so clearly bogus that it brings the United States near dead end in Africa.

While the British government gently nudges closer to supporting the internal (biracial) Rhodesian settlement, the official U.S. line grew tougher last week. The agreement between white Prime Minister Ian Smith and moderate black nationalists, a feat beyond imagination a short year ago, gives hope for a Western-oriented Zimbabwe (the future name for Rhodesia) with the white minority retaining a vital role. Yet the State Department's official spokesman on March 27 branded that settlement "illegal."

Since it seems clearly in U.S. interests, why should the Carter administration denounce it? The State Department's private answer: fear of Fidel Castro's potent Africa corps, fresh from military triumphs in Angola and the Horn of Africa. Should the United States promote a moderate government for Zimbabwe, policymakers told us, the Kremlin might signal Castro to move into Rhodesia and, considering the mood on Capitol Hill, Congress would permit no U.S. response.

Yet U.S. intelligence considers a Soviet-Cuban intervention most unlikely and in no way influenced by statements out of Washington. Those few sturdy souls at State seeking rationality in Africa policy recognize the Cuban threat as a ploy of policymakers headed by Andrew Young, ambassador to the United Nations.

Young's policy is geared entirely to the desires of Nigera and the "frontline" states bordering Rhodesia. These nations have no interest in Rhodesia's white minority and are the patrons of Soviet-backed guerrillas in the Patriotic Front. Thus, the United States enters a policy dead end contrary to its own interests.

But support for the internal settlement is rising among the anti-communist black nations of French-speaking Africa (reflected by Gabon's March 24 statement expressing "optimism"). Once elections install black majority government with a black prime minister in independent Zimbabwe starting in 1978, world support would move toward the moderates. The one potential obstacle: a military takeover before then. That is easier said than done. Guerrilla activity is tepid. Base camps in Mozambique have been cut up by cross-border raids, and barely 1,000 guerrillas now operate within Rhodesia. So the Patriotic Front's only certain way of preventing elections would be intervention by Cuba's well-armed Africa corps.

But U.S. analysts regard such a move as most unlikely, partly because Moscow knows it would bring in the South African army (which, of course, needs no authorization from the U.S. Congress). Although outgunned and outnumbered, White South African troops handled the Cubans in Angola two years ago. This time they would attack in force.

What is truly involved in U.S. policy is not fear of Cubans so much as desire to please Nigeria and other black African states. That this is also British policy was pointed up in London during secret talks Feb. 20–23 between Foreign Secretary David Owen and the Rev. Ndabininghi Sithole, a principal black nationalist leader in the internal settlement.

While calling that settlement "a step in the right direction," Owen repeatedly expressed his need to follow "the opinion of the world," adding: "We can't isolate ourselves from the rest of the world." By "world opinion," Owen clearly meant black African opinion.

Owen pleaded with Sithole to bring in Patriotic Front leader Joshua Nkomo, who exercises political control over the Soviet-equipped but militarily untested guerrilla army based in Zambia. Since Nkomo has little popular support inside Rhodesia, his lifelong dream of power depends on his army—not the ballot box.

On Feb. 20, Owen told Sithole that Nkomo must return for the internal settlement to be acceptable. On Feb. 21, Sithole replied with a question: "How do we get Joshua [Nkomo] to return when he says publicly he will destroy the polling booths in the country and disrupt the democratic process?" A Sithole lieutenant, Joseph Gopo, put it more graphically: "What choices are we given? Take Joshua as King or get slaughtered. He is welcome to try the slaughter." Sithole complained that "a space for Nkomo" means "not only Nkomo but the Cubans and Russians and Zambians as well."

Owen did not insist, declaring: "I don't rule out accepting the internal settlement." He seemed to accept Sithole's objections to an interim British high commissioner and guerrilla domination of Zimbabwe's new national army.

There is not much flexibility in Washington. A Sithole emissary visiting the State Department March 4 was informed that any settlement must be predicated on the Anglo-American proposals. When the official State Department spokesman was instructed on March 24 to put the "illegal" brand on the internal settlement, the United States reached a policy dead end, publicly rationalized by the Cuban spectre.●

DR. MARTIN LUTHER KING, JR.

● Mr. SASSER. Mr. President, today marks the 10th anniversary of the death of one of the truly great men of American history, Dr. Martin Luther King, Jr.

At the age of 39, Martin Luther King had won many great victories. Not only in the South, but all across the Nation, black Americans made significant political and social gains under Dr. King's leadership. Dr. King's powerful weapon was the manner in which he appealed to the conscience of America, saying that "injustice anywhere is a threat to justice everywhere."

The powerful persuasion of his nonviolent movement encouraged the passage of the Civil Rights Act of 1964 and the Voting Rights Act of 1965. Radical changes improved the standing of blacks in America—changes accomplished by the moral force generated by Dr. King.

When Martin Luther King became the youngest man ever to win the Nobel Peace Prize, he said:

Nonviolence is the answer to the crucial political and moral questions of our time; the need for man to overcome oppression and violence without resorting to oppression and violence. Man must evolve for all human conflict a method which rejects revenge, aggression, and retaliation. The foundation of such a method is love.

Ten years ago today, Americans lost the moral force embodied in Dr. King. But that does not mean that the goals and dreams of Martin Luther King are forgotten. His legacy can inspire us to take up the cause to which Dr. King was increasingly focusing his attention—economic injustice.

I have walked the streets of Memphis where Martin Luther King led his last march prior to his tragic death. I have visited with the Memphis sanitation workers with whom Dr. King spent his last days.

I have seen the debilitating effects of economic inequality in Memphis and other cities and towns across the country—and the despair reflected in the faces of millions of jobless young people, many of whom have little hope for the future.

So there is plenty of work to be done. But Dr. King demonstrated the leadership necessary to succeed in difficult times, and we can all benefit from his example.

Martin Luther King offered every American hope that our country would allow every individual to live a decent and fulfilling life. Today, a decade after his death, we must renew our commitment to those dreams which he inspired us to believe.●

CAN THE CONGRESS CATCH UP WITH THE COUNTRY?

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, in hearings held last month by the Joint Economic Committee's Subcommittee on Energy, for which I serve as chairman, it became clear that solar, wind, and other renewable energy sources provide opportunities for employment and energy production which are not being fully utilized by the Federal Government. Now, in an article in the New York Times for April 1, David Morris, director for the Institute for Local Self-Reliance in Washington, tells us about many of the initiatives around the country which are running ahead of the Federal Government in demonstrating how we can save and produce energy.

Instead of increasing electrical energy, Davis, Calif., intends to cut its electricity bill in half in 1985. Ocala, Fla., is rapidly going to solar energy through a unique new financing system. Builders in Atlanta and Eugene, Oreg., have constructed energy-efficient houses which reduce by 60 percent the energy consumption required under the Federal Housing Administration's new minimum standards.

Mr. Morris' article is an invitation for the Federal Government to begin learning from the remarkable innovations taking place throughout the country. I intend to learn about, recognize, and encourage energy innovation at the local level and am pleased to ask that his article, "Looking to Localities for Energy Policy Insights," be printed in the RECORD.

The article follows:

LOOKING TO LOCALITIES FOR ENERGY POLICY INSIGHTS

(By David Morris)

WASHINGTON.—The public has moved far beyond the Federal Government in dealing with the energy crisis. The creativity of our 50 states and more than 6,000 cities and counties should be the basis for national policy. To date, it has not.

While the National Energy Plan has projected a 50 percent increase in electric generation by 1985, the city of Davis, Calif., has adopted a goal of reducing by 50 percent its electricity usage by that year. While the National Energy Plan projects a 300 percent increase in nuclear reactors by 1990, the publicly owned Seattle city light and power utility has refused to participate in new nuclear construction. Its calculations show that energy conservation is a far more beneficial investment than new construction. The Tennessee Valley Authority has discovered that it is economical to provide zero-interest loans for energy conservation.

After three years, the Federal solar tax credit is still languishing in Congress. Since its introduction, California has implemented, not one but two tax credits, raising the credit from 10 percent to 55 percent. It is still unclear whether the Congressional tax credit will contain a refund provision. If it does not, it will lessen the chances of our working class entering the solar age, for this group may not be able to take advantage of the entire credit in one year. New Mexico has a refund provision, and California's tax credit can be carried over until fully used.

Most energy professionals have learned that it can be more efficient to design a home that acts like a collector and storage system than to add on a solar collector. This is done by increasing the amount of south-facing glass and using floor and wall material that collects and stores heat. While the national tax-credit legislation is silent on the eligibility of these so-called passive solar systems, New Mexico already has several years' experience in developing workable regulations in this area.

Local creativity goes still further. There is almost no chance that the Federal Government will enact a low-interest loan program for solar technology this session, even though everyone in the solar field recognizes that financing is the key to rapid commercialization, Santa Clara, Calif., has, through its water and power department, been leasing solar systems. Ocala, Fla., has authorized its publicly owned utility to become the billing and bookkeeping agent for any private solar company that can install solar-energy systems that can be paid for through energy savings.

The Federal Department of Energy's small-scale energy programs are just beginning. Although they are but a speck in the budget, even that little has been a reaction to the successes of small wind-generator companies and small hydroelectric producers, which have successfully demonstrated the economic viability of home systems.

The final draft of the National Energy Plan deleted a prohibition on utilities' discriminating against solar-energy systems through their rate structures, believing it was unnecessary. Yet legal controversies, such as the Public Service Commission litigation in New York State concerning the rate to be paid by Con Edison to purchase electricity pumped back into the grid system from home wind generators, are occurring regularly.

The Federal Government's energy-conservation standards may already be obsolete. There are localities that have surpassed the standards significantly. Builders in Atlanta and Eugene, Ore., have constructed fast-selling energy-efficient houses that reduce by 60 percent the energy consumption required under the Federal Housing Administration's new minimum standards.

It may be understandable that the Federal Government should be behind the rest of the country. The Government's huge size makes any program development a tortuous process. And the relative newness of the energy crisis means that the rest of the country is learning at an accelerated pace.

Yet I am constantly amazed at the lack of knowledge by Federal Administrators and Congressional staff members about what is going on in the rest of the country. It will be extremely unfortunate if the Government should wind up enacting minimal legislation rather than encouraging states, cities and communities to go as far as has been proved feasible in attaining energy self-reliance.

We need a national program that can spotlight those innovations that have proved successful and can learn from the failures. The rich diversity of experimentation is heartening. It is problematic whether the Federal Government is learning from the people.●

CURRENT STATUS OF SALT

● Mr. CULVER. Mr. President, the Strategic Arms Limitation Talks (SALT) are the most important and far-reaching negotiation in which the United States is currently engaged. The slow but careful process of diplomacy is producing an agreement which appears to reduce strategic weapons competition and restrict the range of uncertainty about future threats. Many important issues, however, still remain to be resolved.

The most complete, unclassified summary of the current status of the SALT negotiations, including the issues already agreed and those still under discussion, was given recently in a public address by Mr. Walter Slocombe, Director of the SALT Task Force in the Department of Defense.

Mr. President, I submit Mr. Slocombe's statement for the RECORD.

The statement follows:

STATEMENT ON SALT BY MR. WALTER SLOCOMBE, DIRECTOR, DOD SALT TASK FORCE

Before discussing SALT in detail, let me first offer some general background on the strategic nuclear balance and our nuclear forces.

Although a strategic nuclear attack is the least likely contingency we face, maintenance of the strategic nuclear balance is one of the most vital defense tasks before us. A strategic nuclear equilibrium, in fact, exists between the United States and the Soviet Union at the present time. Strategic deterrence and essential equivalence are in effect.

To be sure, there are differences between the two forces. Without going into detail, suffice it to say that the Soviets now have about 10 percent more launchers, a heavier emphasis on ICBMs, and more throwweight, while the US has more MIRV launchers, and more re-entry vehicles, i.e., weapons, as well as leads in technological quality.

In summary, the United States and the Soviet Union both have large and redundant deterrent forces. Neither side now has a credible capability in terms of sufficient hard target kill weapons for use against hardened silos although this is an area of great concern for the future. While specific force elements and capabilities on each side pose certain problems for the other side, there is a rough balance of strategic capabilities when measured against the static and dynamic indicators used in our strategic analyses. The present situation is a condition of strategic equilibrium.

It is the preservation of this equivalence and stability that we seek to promote in SALT.

This Administration is determined to maintain the U.S. strategic deterrent. We would prefer to maintain it through equitable and verifiable agreements for nuclear arms limitations and reductions. But we as a nation will maintain it by whatever means and resources are necessary. No one should have any doubts whatsoever on that score.

I stress this determination for two basic reasons:

The first, quite simply, is that the strategic balance is not static; owing to a substantial and continuing Soviet effort, it is highly dynamic.

And it is essential to recognize that arms control is only one of the instruments on which we rely. We cannot and do not expect it to do everything—nor is it a reasonable objection to a good agreement that it will not do everything.

The United States has not been idle in the competition; we have done more than sit on our hands. We have programs to maintain each element of the Triad: Trident subs and missles, ALCMs, and Minuteman improvements and work on a mobile ICBM. But all of us must recognize that the Soviets have underway a number of large, impressive, and costly strategic programs to strengthen their offensive capabilities, their active defenses, and their passive defense system.

The Soviets are now deploying a fourth generation of ICBMs at a rate of between 100 and 150 a year. At the same time that the Soviets are improving the current models, they also have four new ICBMs under development. Exactly why the Soviets are pushing so hard to improve their strategic nuclear capabilities is uncertain.

What is certain is that we cannot ignore their efforts. The view of this Administration is that we have for many years been at the point where a full-scale thermonuclear exchange between the Soviet Union and the United States would be a disaster of unprecedented proportions to both sides. None of these Soviet programs—as we understand them in the Defense Department—changes the judgment that a full-scale nuclear exchange would be an unprecedented disaster for them as well as for us.

But if deterrence of nuclear war is our most fundamental defense objective—and it surely is—what counts is what Soviet civilian and military leaders believe. And there is the dimension of how others—Allies and even we ourselves—see the balance. On that score, we face another uncertainty. What we see as sufficient may appear as something else to them. What would deter us might not deter Soviets. What some consider credible as a deterrent, they may dismiss as a bluff. The converse is also true: what seems excessive to us may seem to them no more than an exaggerated prudence demands.

Great caution and careful hedging are essential in the face of these uncertainties. In these circumstances, our strategic forces will need more than the capability for second-strike assured destruction of urban-industrial targets. They must also have the capability to execute a number of other options, and to hold back a significant post-exchange reserve.

Moreover, to meet both our direct military and our broader political need, we insist on essential equivalence with the Soviet Union in strategic nuclear forces.

By essential equivalence, we mean the achievement of these four general conditions:

First, that the Soviets do not see their strategic nuclear forces as usable instruments for political leverage, diplomatic coercion, or military superiority;

Second, that nuclear stability, especially in a crisis, is maintained;

Third, that any advantages in force characteristics enjoyed by the Soviets are offset by other U.S. advantages; and Fourth, that the U.S. posture is not in fact, and is not seen as inferior in performance to the forces of the Soviet Union.

As long as we maintain the capabilities for these tasks, the strategic nuclear balance should remain stable. These objectives set the framework for SALT.

Arms Control. Strategic stability would, ideally, be assured through specific, equitable, and verifiable arms control agreements. Furthermore, stable mutual deterrence and essential equivalence can be maintained at substantially lower strategic force levels than exist at the present time. That is why we have been seeking not only limits on what the United States and the Soviet Union can build, but also reductions in what they actually deploy.

I believe it will be useful to begin by reviewing what has been agreed—and what remains to be done.

The proposed SALT TWO agreement has three principal elements:

A Treaty to last until 1985, embodying basically the Vladivostok Accord with some reductions below the Vladivostok ceilings; as well as a variety of structural provisions to enhance verification and lend precision to the limits.

A Protocol to last until September 1980, temporarily limiting certain aspects of cruise missiles, new types of ballistic missiles, and mobile ICBMs; and Principles and Guidelines for SALT THREE.

The proposed Treaty includes the following major provisions:

An initial overall aggregate level of 2400 strategic systems, to be reduced to an agreed number between 2160 and 2250 during the term of the Treaty.

A 1320 sublimit on MIRVed ICBM and SLBM launchers and aircraft equipped with long-range cruise missiles.

A sublimit of an agreed number between 1200 and 1250 on MIRVed ballistic missiles.

A sublimit of 820 on MIRVed ICBM launchers.

The proposed Protocol includes the following provisions:

A ban on deployment of mobile ICBM launchers and on the flight testing of ICBMs from such launchers.

Limitation on the flight testing and deployment of new types of ballistic missiles.

A ban on the flight testing and deployment of cruise missiles capable of a range in excess of 2500 km, and on the deployment of cruise missiles capable of a range in excess of 600 km on sea- or land-based launchers.

The agreement is still under active negotiation and these issues remain:

First of all, there is the question of the definition of the new types of ballistic missile that are to be restricted in the Proctol. In other words, this involves the nature of the qualitative improvements that are to be inhibited through the Protocol.

What is a new type? Is the improvement of a marginal type, changing of the screws, a significant improvement or not? How about several improvements of this sort? How about the introduction of a new guidance system for an existing missile? At what point do minor improvements become major improvements? At what point do improvements become qualitative changes?

The question of inhibition on new types has become further complicated by the Soviet desire to have a specific exemption permitting them to introduce one new missile type, one new ICBM.

A second issue which is yet to be resolved involves the issue of cruise missile range definition

To simplify, I suppose most people would say if you are setting a limit and a range of cruise missiles, it is a limit from the place of launch to the place of target. The problem, however, is the cruise missile does not fly in a straight line at a certain altitude. It flies at different altitudes and it flies in a zigzag pattern. It flies at different speeds. And thus the question arises of how to reflect in the range definitions an allowance for the cruise missile to follow its flight pattern.

A third issue which is yet to be worked out is, of course, the issue of the Backfire. What kind of restrictions on the Backfire can give us a sufficient assurance that it will not be relied on as a strategic system? The Russians feel strongly this should be exempted altogether; that it is an intermediate range system. They feel that their word on it suffices. Our position is in addition to their word, we would like to have explicit assurances, the effect of which will be to inhibit them significantly from using the system as a strategic system.

Fourth, there is still the issue of the "aggregates," i.e., the numerical limits. Our position is that the total limits imposed on all strategic systems should be reduced from the Vladivostock level of 2,400 to 2,160. That is to say, a flat 10 percent reduction. The Soviets would prefer a more modest reduction down to 2,250.

The second numbers issue is that the combined ALCM-MIRed limit of 1,320 should have a sub-limit for it of 1,200 specifically for MIRV ballistic missiles alone. It permits us to have 120 heavy bombers with ALCMs without paying a price for it in MIRVs. The Russians insist that this limit be 1,250, which gives us only 70 such heavy bombers, after which we have to pay a price in MIRVs.

A fifth issue which is still to be resolved is the kind of principles for SALT III that SALT II will incorporate. It is our hope that when SALT II is signed, it will include targets for SALT III. And we would like to make these targets fairly explicit and fairly ambitious—significant reductions, further restraints on modernization.

Sixth, there is still some negotiating going on on data base. This is an exchange of data on both sides. In the past, much of SALT was negotiated on the basis of American data. We are now having an exchange of data. We are making good progress on that.

Seventh, there is a question of MIRV verification. This is a highly complicated technical issue again, but we want certain assurances that missiles which are not MIRVed are not placed in launchers which are the same for MIRVs and non-MIRVs.

Eight, there is the question of how to distinguish among different planes of the same type some of which are strategic bombers but some of which are also used for non-strategic missions—for example, anti-submarine warfare or tankers. If you don't count them, how do you distinguish them and how do you make sure they are not easily transferable from one mode to the other. This issue also affects our flexibility to equip aircraft with cruise missiles.

Here in a nutshell is the package of issues. This detail I think indicates to you the problems in SALT which have necessitated a slow pace are real. They are not political. They are not artificial. They are genuinely complicated and difficult issues. And we have made reasonably good progress on them.

As to verification, although the possibility of some undetected cheating in certain areas exists, any cheating on a scale large enough to alter the strategic balance would be discovered in time to make an appropriate response. There will be areas of uncertainty, but they are not such as to permit the Soviets to produce a significant unanticipated threat to US interests and those uncertainties can, in any event, be compensated for with the flexibility inherent in our own programs.

In summary, we are making some progress in SALT on both constraints and reductions. If the eventual SALT II agreement meets our expectations, it will:

Mean somewhat lower levels of strategic delivery systems and MIRVs than was envisaged at Vladivostok or in later talks—and lower than we estimate we would face if there were no agreement;

Introduce an important new sublimit on deployments: a sublimit on the total number of MIRVed ICBMs;

Permit us to deploy an air-launched cruise missile (ALCM) force to maintain the effectiveness of the bomber leg of the TRIAD;

Constrain to some degree the pace of technological change, but preserve U.S. flexibility to continue R&D on various types of cruise missiles and mobile ICBMs;

Meet specific allied concerns by omitting forward-based systems (FBS) and allied systems while fully preserving cruise missile options;

Place some limits on BACKFIRE, although important details of the limits are still being negotiated.

While the United States would have preferred a more far-reaching agreement, the one that is now beginning to take shape will constitute a significant step toward meeting our strategic objectives through arms control, and could lead to further mutual restraint, both qualitative and quantitative. The reductions in Soviet launchers, coupled with the sublimits on MIRVed ballistic missiles in general, and MIRVed ICBMs in particular, will help to preserve perceptions of essential equivalence and will contribute to military equivalence and stability. Mobile ICBM research and development can continue on a schedule that will not inhibit our present plans. Work can go forward on ground-launched and sea-launched cruise missiles.

In sum, we are drawing close to an agreement that will serve our strategic purposes. Even with such an agreement, however, we will have to continue looking to our own exertions in several key areas to ensure the conditions of deterrence. Under present conditions, SALT alone cannot preserve long-term strategic stability; it must be supplemented by prudent U.S. decisions to ensure the strategic deterrent.●

TAX REFORM AT THE MASTERS GOLF TOURNAMENT AND THE KENTUCKY DERBY

● Mr. KENNEDY. Mr. President, yesterday I wrote to Mr. Jerome Kurtz, Commissioner of Internal Revenue, asking the IRS to crack down on the tax-deductible use of corporate jets and other private aircraft for pleasure trips to sporting events like the Masters Golf Tournament this week in Augusta, Ga., and the Kentucky Derby next month in Louisville, Ky.

As I stated in the letter, these two events have become notorious magnets for pleasure seekers in corporate jets. I believe that tax subsidies should not be used to defray the cost of the trip. Highly paid executives are entitled to fly to these famous sports events in corporate aircraft. But they are not entitled to a Treasury tax subsidy to help pay the cost of the trip—a tax subsidy that must be paid for with the tax dollars of average citizens.

Mr. President, I submit the text of my letter to Commissioner Kurtz for the RECORD.

The letter follows:

U.S. SENATE,
April 3, 1978.

HON. JEROME KURTZ,
Commissioner, Internal Revenue Service.

DEAR COMMISSIONER KURTZ: Although I am a strong supporter of the Carter Administration's tax reform proposals in the area of martini lunches, business entertainment, and other forms of expense account living, I believe that it is also important for the Internal Revenue Service to more effectively police the existing law, imperfect as it is, to insure that abuses are avoided to the greatest extent possible.

One area that has been a source of increasing concern in recent years has been the promiscuous use of private corporate jets for personal pleasure trips. In some cases, of course, the tax-deductible use of company planes can be justified as an "ordinary and necessary" business expense within the meaning of section 162 of the Internal Revenue Code, as in cases where company planes are used for business purposes to transport executives to locations inaccessible or poorly served by commercial airlines.

But it is difficult to believe that tax deductions should be permitted under current law in cases where the obvious and overwhelming purpose of the use of company planes is for executive pleasure trips.

This week and next month, two sporting events are scheduled to take place which have become notorious magnets for wealthy pleasure seekers in corporate jets—the Masters Golf Tournament in Augusta, Georgia, and the Kentucky Derby in Louisville, Kentucky.

I am writing at this time to urge the Internal Revenue Service to ensure that the costs of such pleasure jaunts to these and similar events are not charged off as tax deductible business expenses. I would hope that, as tax returns are audited, IRS agents will pay particular attention to this kind of expense in connection with their audits.

Highly paid executives with private planes or with access to their corporate aircraft are entitled to fly to these outstanding sports events. But they are not entitled to a Treasury tax subsidy to defray the cost of the trip—a tax subsidy that must be paid for with the hard-earned tax dollars of average taxpayers.

My understanding is that your authority under current law is ample to end these abuses of the Internal Revenue Code, by denying a business tax deduction for such expenses, or by requiring the value of such a trip to be added to the taxable income of the executives who make the trip. If that is not the case, I hope you will let me know, so that adequate remedies may be included as part of the President's tax reform program that Congress is now considering.

I understand that you have recently sent out additional instructions to IRS agents in the field to pay more careful attention in their audits to travel and entertainment expenses. Certainly, the sort of flights I have mentioned should be prime examples of the types of expenses that need greater scrutiny.

I realize that the resources of the Internal Revenue Service for enforcement purposes are already stretched thin. But these luxury sporting event trips are highly visible abuses of the tax system and have highly adverse effects on the morale of ordinary taxpayers now filling out their annual tax returns. In this situation, I believe that the value of an effective IRS compliance effort would be well worth the additional IRS resources required to achieve it.

Sincerely,

EDWARD M. KENNEDY.●

PRODUCTIVITY SCIENCE, AND TECHNOLOGY: KEYS TO U.S. ECONOMIC GROWTH

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, last night I made a statement about the importance of dealing with the inflation problem, how we neglected it very badly, and how it was the No. 1 economic problem which faces our country. There are a number of things we can do about it.

It was called to my attention today that the distinguished Comptroller General of the United States, Mr. Staats, has recently made a speech on productivity. This is at the very heart of the longrun inflation problem. Obviously, if we can make industry more productive it will be possible to pay higher wages without wage costs going up and, therefore, without inflationary pressures. I would like to call attention to several of the elements of this remarkable speech by Mr. Staats. He points out:

Daily, we are reminded in the press, in congressional debate, and by business and labor leaders—

That technology innovation has not kept pace with that of our principal industrial competitors;

That we are becoming an increasingly "have not" Nation in the critical areas of energy and minerals;

Of the seriousness of decline in the value of the dollar against the hard currencies of many countries—a direct result of our large adverse balance of payments; and

Of the impact on production costs arising from popular demands for stricter regulations dealing with health, safety and the environment.

In addition to that, Mr. President, Mr. Staats refers to the National Commission on Productivity, and he points out that they identified four major factors contributing to productivity improvement:

1. There must be a strong underlying scientific base to provide the technological change from which practical applications can be developed,

2. There must be access to available technical information and know-how about products and processes,

3. There must be incentive to develop new products or to invest in products developed by others, and

4. There must be adequate capital resources available to finance the development and installation of new products and processes.

As far as what the Federal Government can do about it, Mr. Staats points to these areas:

Assessing periodically the nature, extent, and location of productivity problems and the status of ongoing productivity programs for all sectors of the economy;

Acting as a facilitator in bringing various groups together in a non-adversary environment to discuss productivity problems affecting more than one group, organization, or industry. Similarly, it can serve as a neutral third party, encouraging labor-management cooperation in finding ways to better use the energy and talents of workers;

Operating a productivity clearinghouse to provide national and international productivity data and knowledge on what is known about various aspects of productivity: Who knows what methods work, how much they cost, and how long they take to accomplish. This would serve all sectors of the economy.

To counteract industry's reluctance to invest in innovative R&D, the Government should seek ways to stabilize the economic outlook and the regulatory environment. The Carter administration has indicated a need to better understand how the Federal Government can assist in the technology innovation process.

I have been informed that the President's Science Advisor, Dr. Frank Press, will soon be proposing to the President that his Office and the Department of Commerce undertake a year-long domestic policy review of how the Federal Government can assist industry in stimulating the rate of technological innovation.

I might say, in conclusion, our Banking Committee expects to hold hearings on inflation in the next few weeks. We will have hearings particularly on productivity and what the Federal Government can do to improve productivity so our economy can move ahead.

PRESSING NEED FOR GENOCIDE CONVENTION

Mr. PROXMIRE. Mr. President, the Inter-American Commission on Human Rights recently reported on the state of human rights in several countries. Uruguay came under stiff criticism in the Commission's report for repeated violations of basic human rights. Specifically, it noted:

"Grave violations of the following human rights have been committed in Uruguay: The rights to life, to liberty, to the security of the person; the right to freedom of opinion, expression and diffusion of beliefs.

The situation of the following human rights in Uruguay is a serious one. The United States has already terminated military assistance to that country because of its poor human rights record. I applaud this strong action; it takes strong action for this country to further the cause of human rights to which it is so dedicated.

President Carter has spoken often about the importance of the human rights issue. It was certainly one of the central themes of his recent trips to parts of South America and Africa. I believe that it is fitting for this country not only to pride itself on its own respect for human rights, but also to urge other countries, such as Uruguay, to adopt a more progressive approach to those rights.

The fact that human rights are still not universally respected is one of the best arguments in favor of the ratification of the Genocide Convention. The treaty provides that the commission of genocide will be considered as an international crime. For thirty years now, the treaty has been awaiting the action of the Senate, action which I feel is long overdue. Every President since President Truman has pleaded with the Senate to ratify this convention. This country should welcome the opportunity to associate itself with a document which seeks to guarantee that the fundamental human right, the right to live, will be respected. Uruguay is certainly not the only country where human rights violations are rampant. I have often referred to the barbarous activities of the governments in Uganda and Cambodia.

I hope that the Senate will act affirmatively on the Genocide Convention soon. Ratification of this treaty will serve to show that this country is willing to take the strong steps necessary to further the cause of human rights. I urge the Senate to ratify the Genocide Convention as soon as possible.

COMMITTEE MEETINGS

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Armed Services Committee be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Friday, April 7, to consider the military procurement authorization bill and the military construction authorization bill, both of which must be reported by the Senate by May 15 under the Budget Act.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Consumer Subcommittee of the Commerce, Science, and Transportation Committee be authorized to meet during the session of the Senate on Wednesday, April 5, 1978, to hold hearings on S. 2706, reauthorization of the Consumer Product Safety Commission.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

CONSIDERATION OF CERTAIN MEASURES ON THE CALENDAR

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, there are two measures on the calendar which have been cleared all around for passage. I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Calendar Orders Nos. 653 and 655.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EXTENDING AUTHORIZATIONS FOR THE AMERICAN FOLKLIFE CENTER

The bill (H.R. 5981) to amend the American Folklife Preservation Act to extend the authorizations of appropriations contained in such act, was considered, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill passed.

Mr. HATCH. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an excerpt from the report (No. 95–712), explaining the purposes of the measure.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PURPOSE

The bill would amend the American Folklife Preservation Act, Public Law 94–201, approved January 2, 1976, to provide (1) that the authorization of appropriations for the American Folklife Center at the Library of Congress be extended for a 3-year period—fiscal years 1979, 1980, and 1981; and (2) that Presidential appointees as members of the Board of Trustees for the Center shall serve only during the time they are officials of Federal departments or agencies concerned with some aspect of American folklife traditions and arts.

BACKGROUND

The American Folklife Center was created in 1976 by Congress and directed to preserve and present American folklife through programs of research, documentation, archival preservation, live presentation, exhibition, publication, dissemination, training, and other activities involving the many folk cultural traditions of the United States. In the brief period of the Center's operation it has begun energetically to carry out its mandate with programs that provide coordination, assistance, and model projects for the field of American folklife.

EXPLANATION OF THE BILL

The extension of authorization is limited to an additional 3-year period in order to provide the Congress with the opportunity to evaluate the Center's operations. Authorization levels are set at $685,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1979; $1,065,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1980; and $1,355,000 for the fiscal year ending September 30, 1981. These levels represent increases in the present budget with a stable operating budget to be reached in 1981.

The present statute provides that 4 of the 13-member Board of Trustees for the Center be appointed by the President from among individuals who are officials of Federal departments and agencies concerned with some aspect of American folklife traditions and arts. The amendment to the act contained in H.R. 5581 would clarify the intent of the Congress that a Presidential appointee from such a department or agency be entitled to serve only during the time he remains an official with a department or agency related to folklife concerns. Transfer to a nonfolklife department, or resignation from the Federal service, would terminate the appointment.

INCREASED AUTHORIZATION FOR THE WORK INCENTIVE PROGRAM

The bill (S. 2779) to authorize additional appropriations for the work incentive program establishing by title IV of the Social Security Act, was considered, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 401 of Public Law 95–30 is amended by striking out "$435,000,000 for fiscal year 1979" and inserting in lieu thereof "$700,000,000 for fiscal year 1979".

SEC. 2. (a) Subsection (d) of section 403 of the Social Security Act is amended to read as follows:

"(d)(1) Notwithstanding paragraph (3) of subsection (a) the rate specified in such paragraph shall be deemed to be 90 per centum with respect to social and supportive services provided pursuant to section 402(a)(19)(G).

"(2) Of the sums authorized to be appropriated by sections 401 and 431 for any fiscal year (commencing with the fiscal year ending September 30, 1980), the aggregate of the sums appropriated for the following purposes shall not exceed $1,500,000,000: (A) for the purpose of making payments with respect to services to which paragraph (1) applies, and (B) for the purpose of establishing or carrying out programs authorized to be established by section 432.".

(b) The first sentence of section 431(a) of such Act is amended by striking out "There" and inserting in lieu thereof "Subject to section 403(d)(2), there".

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill passed.

Mr. HATCH. I move to lay that motion on the table.

The motion to lay on the table was agreed to.

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an excerpt from the report (No. 95–713), explaining the purposes of the measure.

There being no objection, the excerpt was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I. SUMMARY OF THE BILL

The work incentive (WIN) program is designed to assist families on welfare to become independent through training, placement, and other services. Federal funds pay 90 percent of the cost of the program. The administration has included $365 million in the 1979 budget for the WIN program; a bill signed into law last year (Public Law 95-30) authorized an additional $435 million for employment and supportive services for welfare recipients, with no requirement for State matching funds.

The committee bill would increase the amounts authorized under existing law by an additional $265 million in fiscal year 1979. In addition, the bill would authorize funding for the WIN program of up to $1.5 billion for years after fiscal year 1979.

II. BACKGROUND AND GENERAL EXPLANATION OF THE BILL

The work incentive (WIN) program was established under the Social Security Act as a means of assisting families on welfare to become independent through training, placement, and other services. Federal funds pay 90 percent of the cost of the program. Despite limited Federal funding, which has remained basically at the same level since fiscal year 1974, this program has been progressively more successful in placing WIN participants in nonsubsidized employment and reducing the welfare rolls.

In fiscal year 1973, 34,000 families in which a family member was a WIN participant went off welfare and an additional 31,000 families received a reduced AFDC grant because of the salaries earned by WIN participants who became employed. In fiscal year 1976, 87,000 such families went off welfare, and 95,000 received a reduced AFDC grant because of the salaries earned by WIN participants. These figures represent a substantial increase over fiscal year 1973. In fiscal year 1977, there were 136,000 such families who went off welfare, and an additional 135,000 families who remained welfare recipients, but whose AFDC payments were reduced due to their additional income.

The Labor Department estimates overall savings of $655 million in fiscal year 1977 related to the employment of WIN participants, including $409 million in Federal funds and $246 million in State and local funds. The total represents $439 million in annualized welfare payment reductions, medicaid savings of $115 million, and food stamps reductions of $102 million. All of this has occurred with basically the same amount of funding in the last 4 fiscal years, and despite the fact that this has been a period of relatively high unemployment.

The administration has included $365 million in the 1979 budget for the WIN program. Public Law 95–30 authorized an additional $435 million for employment and supportive services for welfare recipients with no requirement for State matching funds. The committee bill would increase the amounts authorized under last year's law by an additional $265 million in fiscal year 1979. In addition, the bill would authorize funding for the WIN program of up to $1.5 billion for years after fiscal year 1979.

Present funding levels allow full participation in the program by only one-fourth of WIN registrants. Seventy-five percent of the current 2.2 million persons registered during a given year receive no services other than registration and appraisal. The committee bill would enable the Secretary of Health, Education, and Welfare and the Secretary of Labor to provide the kinds of services needed to help significant numbers of welfare recipients prepare for and find employment. This includes coaching and orientation to employment and job development and placement assistance. In addition, supportive services, including child care, are to be provided when necessary.

The WIN program is directed at those who most need help in finding and holding a job—employable recipients of aid to families with dependent children (AFDC). Increasing the level of activity under the WIN program will result in promoting the employment of recipients, thereby increasing their income, and enhancing their capability for self-support and independence. It will also help to reduce the welfare caseload.

Section 1 of the committee bill would authorize additional funding for the WIN program of $700 million for fiscal year 1979 (compared with $435 million under present law) without a requirement for State matching. When this authorization is added to the amount already in the President's budget ($365 million), the total funding would be $1.065 billion. With a program of this magnitude, it is estimated by the Department of Labor that the WIN program would generate total welfare and other savings to the taxpayer in 1979 of $1.526 billion of which $949 million would be the Federal share and $577 million would represent State and local savings.

At the increased funding level of $1,065 billion, it is anticipated that 575,000 WIN participants will be employed in nonsubsidized employment in 1979. In fiscal year 1979, 335,000 families in the aid to families with dependent children (AFDC) program in which a family member was one of these WIN participants will go off welfare and an additional 240,000 families will receive a reduced AFDC monthy payment because of salaries earned by the employed WIN participants. This would result in annualized welfare payment reductions of $1.0 billion, savings in medicaid of $296 million, and savings in food stamp expenditures of $230 million in fiscal year 1979.

Section 2 of the committee bill would amend sections 403(d) and 431 of the Social Security Act to authorize funding for the WIN program of up to $1.5 billion for years after fiscal year 1979.

ORDER FOR RECESS UNTIL 9 A.M. TOMORROW

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate, when it completes its business today, stand in recess until the hour of 9 a.m. tomorrow morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

ORDER FOR RECOGNITION TOMORROW OF SENATOR HARRY F. BYRD, JR., AND SENATOR DOLE AND FOR RESUMPTION OF CONSIDERATION OF THE PANAMA CANAL TREATY

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that, after the prayer on tomorrow morning, Mr. HARRY F. BYRD, JR., be recognized for not to exceed 10 minutes; that Mr. DOLE then be recognized for not to exceed 15 minutes, and that, no later than 9:30 a.m. on tomorrow, the Senate resume consideration of the treaty.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

PROGRAM

Mr. ROBERT C. BYRD. Mr. President, the Senate will convene at 9 a.m. tomorrow morning. The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rabbi Henry E. Kraus, Ph. D., D.D., Temple Beth Ami, West Covina, Calif., offered the following prayer:

I humbly ask God to bless the work of your hands and the thoughts of your minds. May you establish justice to bring peace to mankind. I pray we will understand: "Eternity is not perpetual future, but perpetual presence."

I quote the ancient prayer:

"May God who established peace in the High, may He establish peace here in Earth."

Amen.

RABBI HENRY E. KRAUS

(Mr. LLOYD of California asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. LLOYD of California. Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to welcome a close friend, Dr. Henry E. Kraus, rabbi of Temple Beth Ami, West Covina, Calif., as today's visiting clergyman. Rabbi Kraus was ordained at the Jewish Theological Seminary at Budapest, Hungary, with the highest rabbinical degrees and received his Ph. D. at the University of Budapest.

It was on this day, April 4, 1944, that he was forced by the Nazis to wear the Yellow Star of David as a sign of degradation. Along with his congregation, he was deported to Auschwitz and later, Buchenwald. The American 3d Army liberated him in 1945.

After the war, he became chief rabbi of western Hungary. Rabbi Kraus was one of the 12-member governing body of the Hungarian Jews, as well as one of the 7 members of the board of governors of the Jewish Theological Seminary of Budapest, where he lectured on the "practical rabbinate." He also lectured at the universities on philosophy and ancient history and was a frequent speaker on Radio Budapest. He has authored a book and many articles. It was during the Hungarian revolution that he escaped and came to this country in January 1957.

A member of the Rabbinical Assembly, Rabbi Kraus served as one of the vice presidents of the assembly's western region and is also a former president of the Los Angeles Eastern Area Board of Rabbis.

In 1975 the State of Israel honored him with the Ben Gurion Award—he was the first recipient of this award in California—and in June 1976 the Jewish Theological Seminary of America awarded him a doctor of divinity, honoris causa.

I feel we are honored to have him with us today, and would also like to welcome his family, who are here with us today.

ERNEST WARD McBRAYER

(Mr. HUBBARD asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. HUBBARD. Mr. Speaker, it is with sadness that I speak today in the House of Representatives regarding the late Ernest Ward McBrayer of Greenup, Ky.

Mr. McBrayer was born July 31, 1912, in Greenup County, a son of the late Ernest and Myrtle Brown McBrayer. He was a retired roundhouse foreman for the Chessie System, an elder of the Greenup Christian Church, a member of the Greenup Lions Club and a member of the Friday Morning Prayer Breakfast Group in Greenup. He was a veteran of the U.S. Navy, serving in World War II.

His son, Kentucky Commerce Commissioner W. Terry McBrayer, is a longtime friend of mine with whom I attended the University of Louisville School of Law and we served together in the Kentucky Legislature and various political endeavors.

Surviving in addition to Ward McBrayer's son are his wife, Mrs. Ethel Brown McBrayer, a retired elementary school principal; two daughters, Mrs. Phyllis Smith of Greenup and Mrs. Judy Campbell of Frankfort; a brother, Sherman McBrayer of Raceland; four sisters, Mrs. Nell Burroughs, Miss Virginia McBrayer and Mrs. Dixie Daugherty, all of Worthington, and Mrs. Edna Hall of Greenup; and seven grandchildren.

I extend to the McBrayer family my sincere sympathy upon the death of this outstanding Kentuckian whose life influenced so many people.

CRUDE OIL TAX MAKES LITTLE SENSE

(Mr. LEACH asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks and include extraneous matter.)

Mr. LEACH. Mr. Speaker, with the return of the President from his extended trip to Latin America and Africa, there is wide ranging speculation that the administration is considering the possibility of imposing a substantial duty on imported crude oil. This tax would add an additional one-fourth to one-half percent to the rate of inflation in America and give OPEC every incentive to increase prices even further.

Of fundamental significance to people of my home State of Iowa is that any tax on crude oil will not be equitably distributed. Most heavily such a tax will fall on the Midwest in that 16 percent of all crude oil is consumed by farmers although they make up less than 4 percent of the population. In addition to being antiagriculture, a tax on crude oil is anti-Northern because of our severe winters and antirural because in States like Iowa we do not have the benefit of mass transportation nor the option to drive smaller cars on our rural gravel roads.

A 7-cent-a-gallon increase in gasoline prices, which a $6 a barrel import tax implies, can only be justified if it leads to decreased consumption or decreased reliance on imported oil. Unfortunately most economists agree that energy usage is not apt to be discouraged much nor domestic production encouraged much by price increases of this nature. What therefore is disturbing to the people of Iowa is the appearance that a new crude oil tax will be less related to the need for an energy program than it is to the need to raise new taxes to pay for the President's spending programs, particularly his new urban emphasis.

In this regard, it is becoming increasingly clear that what we are witnessing in this administration is a massive reorientation of Federal spending away from rural areas to the urban centers and a massive increase in tax obligations for States like Iowa to pay for these programs. In 1976, for example, the 10 most depressed urban centers received 31 cents in Federal aid for every dollar raised locally. Now in 1978, these same cities get 54 cents for every local tax dollar, and this will go up further if the administration's latest urban program is adopted.

My feeling is that neither energy nor many other American problems are likely to be solved through taxation. A crude oil tax, whether it be in the form of an import duty to raise the price of imported oil or a crude oil equalization tax, as the administration proposed last spring, to raise the price of American-produced oil to world standards, is clearly unjustified. But if the administration imposes the former or Congress acquiesces to the latter, any new revenues should be used to roll back recent social security tax increases rather than to support the new spending programs which have so disastrously gotten out of hand. Inflation can only be controlled if we constrain Federal spending and match revenues with expenditures. The administration would be well advised to rethink its tax and spending initiatives. We need greater constraints in Federal spending, greater equity in the raising as well as distribution of Federal funds.

REINTRODUCTION OF SMALL BUSINESS TAX

(Mr. SCHULZE asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. SCHULZE. Mr. Speaker, I am today reintroducing, for the second time, the Small Business Tax Relief Act of 1978. I am pleased to note that the response to the bill has been very positive from both sides of the aisle and from all parts of the country.

To date 37 of my colleagues have cosponsored the Small Business Tax Relief Act of 1978. I believe that this bill provides a vehicle for assisting, in a meaningful way, small businessmen and those in our Nation who wish to become small businessmen.

There is not one Representative in this Chamber who does not have a significant number of small businessmen in his or her constituency. When one considers that approximately 87 percent of businesses are small businesses it is clear that we in the Congress must help insure that these commercial ventures prosper and grow.

Mr. Speaker, I am gratified to be able to reintroduce the Small Business Tax Relief Act of 1978 and call upon my colleagues to join me in nonpartisan efforts to assist those who make up our Nation's commercial backbone.

CANCELLATION OF NEUTRON WEAPON SEEN AS SERIOUS MISTAKE

(Mr. MONTGOMERY asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. MONTGOMERY. Mr. Speaker, I understand that it has been partially confirmed that President Carter has reconsidered and ordered that the neutron weapon system not be completed. I have reference to what is described as the neutron bomb.

As a member of the Committee on Armed Services chaired by the gentleman from Illinois (Mr. PRICE), I along with 16 other Members, went to Russia this past week, and we met with the Soviets. One of the great concerns of the Russians was that they are awfully anxious about the neutron weapon.

This weapon is, in my opinion, one of the real deterrents that we have against Russia. What I am saying is that I think President Carter, if he has canceled the building of the neutron weapon, has made a very serious mistake.

The neutron weapon is not a bomb. It is a weapon that can be used on the battlefield and would be most useful on the battlefield; it would not be used to kill civilians, as would the SS–20 Russian missile which is aimed at the NATO forces. I might add that the neutron weapon is not aimed at the Soviets but would be used in battle.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat that I think this is a very serious mistake. This action weakens our position in dealing with the Soviet Union.

CANCELLATION OF THE NEUTRON BOMB WOULD SERIOUSLY IMPAIR OUR BARGAINING POSITION IN THE SALT NEGOTIATIONS

(Mr. STRATTON asked and was given permission to address the House for 1 minute and to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. STRATTON. Mr. Speaker, I take this time to join in the remarks which I understand my colleague from Mississippi (Mr. MONTGOMERY) made a few moments ago with respect to the news that appeared on the front page of the New York Times this morning to the effect that the President has already made a decision to cancel the neutron bomb.

Like Mr. MONTGOMERY, I was a member of a delegation of the Armed Services Committee which just returned from one week in the Soviet Union, and which conferred with the top Soviet military official, the Chief of Staff of the Soviet Armed Forces, Gen. Nikolai Ogarkov. I think it ought to be noted by the administration and by this House that the neutron bomb, as we discovered in Moscow, does represent about the only bargaining chip that we have in trying to conclude a SALT treaty that will effectively protect the interests of the United States.

I think, at this point in the negotiations, it would be most unwise for us to take another action in the direction of unilateral disarmament. I trust that the press story this morning is not true, and that the President will proceed with this new, cleaner weapon as scheduled.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STRATTON. I will be happy to yield.

Mr. BRECKINRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to join in the remarks of my friend from New York (Mr. STRATTON), and associate myself with him.

I would also like to observe, as a member of the same group just returned from Russia, that that decision if it is indeed and in fact the decision of the President, rather than merely a rumor, as I trust it is will be recognized by our enemies and allies alike as the retreat of America from the frontline defense of Europe, and the desertion of its allies.

Mr. STANTON. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman for yielding.

ERNESTO J. GARCIA, JR.

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the Senate bill (S. 958) for the relief of Ernesto Garcia, Jr., and ask for its immediate consideration.

The Clerk read the title of the Senate bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the Senate bill, as follows:

S. 958

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, in the administration of the Immigration and Nationality Act, Ernesto Garcia, Junior may be classified as a child within the meaning of section 101(b)(1)(C) of such Act upon approval of a petition pursuant to section 204 of such Act filed in his behalf by Ernesto Juan Garcia, a citizen of the United States: Provided, That the brothers and sisters and the natural mother of the beneficiary shall not, by virtue of such relationship or parentage, be accorded any right, privilege, or status under the Immigration and Nationality Act.

MOTION OFFERED BY MR. EILBERG

Mr. EILBERG. Mr. Speaker, I offer a motion.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. EILBERG moves to strike out all after the enacting clause of the Senate bill S. 958, and insert in lieu thereof the provisions of H.R. 2660, as passed by the House.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Ernesto F. Garcia, Junior.".

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

A similar House bill (H.R. 2660) was laid on the table.

AUTHORIZING SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR TO MEMORIALIZE THE 56 SIGNERS OF THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE

Mr. NEDZI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H.R. 2960) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to memorialize the 56 signers of the Declaration of Independence in Constitution Gardens in the District of Columbia, with a Senate amendment thereto, and concur in the Senate amendment.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment, as follows:

Mr. NEDZI (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate amendment be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the initial request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. BAUMAN. Reserving the right to object, Mr. Speaker, could the gentleman from Michigan explain what this legislation does and what the other body's amendment does.

Mr. NEDZI. If the gentleman will yield, I will be very pleased to explain for the benefit of the Members of the House.

Mr. Speaker, as my colleagues will remember, H.R. 2960 authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to erect a memorial in Constitution Gardens to honor the 56 signers of the Declaration of Independence.

The Senate Rules Committee, in considering the bill, detected and corrected a drafting error in line 7. The House version omitted the word "with" in the following sentence:

The Secretary of the Interior . . . may establish a memorial in honor of the 56 men who signed the Declaration of Independence, such memorial to be on a suitable site selected by the Secretary, with the approval of the National Commission of Fine Arts . . .

And so on. The Senate amendment corrects the obvious omission. It does nothing to change the meaning, and I recommend that the amendment be agreed to.

Mr. BAUMAN. I wonder if the gentleman could refresh the recollection of the gentleman from Maryland. It seems to me we had this bill up sometime last year. What is the cost associated with the overall legislation?

Mr. NEDZI. If the gentleman will yield further, my recollection is that there was no cost. It was to be paid for out of the proceeds of the sale of certain Bicentennial medals that the Bicentennial Commission had provided for.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman from Michigan, and I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the initial request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

PROVIDING FOR DESIGNATION OF LIBRARIES OF ACCREDITED LAW SCHOOLS AS DEPOSITORY LIBRARIES OF GOVERNMENT PUBLICATIONS

Mr. NEDZI. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's desk the bill (H.R. 8358) to amend title 44, United States Code, to provide for the designation of libraries of accredited law schools as depository libraries of Government publications, with Senate amendments thereto, and concur in the Senate amendments.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

The Clerk read the Senate amendments, as follows:

Page 2, line 9, strike out "purpose."." and insert "purpose or accredited by the highest appellate court of the State in which the law school is located."."

Page 2, after the matter following line 12, insert:

SEC. 3. The amendments made by this Act shall take effect on October 1, 1978.

Mr. NEDZI (during the reading). Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate amendments be considered as read and printed in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the initial request of the gentleman from Michigan?

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I wonder if the gentleman can offer an explanation.

Mr. NEDZI. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will yield, I would be very happy to.

This bill, H.R. 8358, provides that libraries of accredited law schools may, upon application to the Public Printer and in compliance with the depository laws, be designated depositories of Government documents.

The Senate has added two amendments: The first simply adds a new section 3 providing for an effective date of October 1, 1978. The amendment allows the Public Printer to prepare for the program and provides that startup coincide with the start of the coming fiscal year.

The second amendment enlarges the term "accredited law school" as used in the bill. As the bill passed the House, an accredited law school was defined as:

Any law school which is accredited by a nationally recognized accrediting agency or association approved by the Commissioner of Education for such purpose.

The nationally recognized accrediting agency for law is the American Bar Association.

The Senate added as an additional accrediting body the highest appellate court of the State in which the law school is located.

Estimates vary as to the number of schools actually affected by the amendment. However, it seems clear that supreme courts in only five States, Alabama, California, Georgia, Mississippi, and Tennessee—accredit non-ABA accredited schools for purposes of allowing the students of these schools to take the bar in the State.

More importantly, because law school libraries applying for depository status must also meet the preexisting requirements of the depository laws, such as possession of minimum number of volumes, and accessibility by the public among others, it is estimated that few schools not accredited by the ABA will be able to meet the threshold requirements for the program. The only costs involved will be the costs of inspection by the Public Printer.

I recommend that the House agree to both Senate amendments.

(Mr. NEDZI asked and was given permission to revise and extend his remarks.)

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Speaker, I thank the gentleman, and I withdraw my reservation of objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the initial request of the gentleman from Michigan?

There was no objection.

A motion to reconsider was laid on the table.

ANNOUNCEMENT BY THE SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Pursuant to the provisions of clause 3(b) of rule XXVII, the Chair announces that he will postpone further proceedings today on which a recorded vote or the yeas and nays are ordered, or on which the vote is objected to under clause 4 of rule XV.

WHITE HOUSE PERSONNEL AUTHORIZATION

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, I move to suspend the rules and pass the bill (H.R. 11003) to clarify the authority for employment of personnel in the White House Office and the Executive Residence at the White House, to clarify the authority for employment of personnel by the President to meet unanticipated needs, and for other purposes, as amended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. MURTHA). The gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER) will be recognized for 20 minutes, and the gentleman from New York (Mr. GILMAN) will be recognized for 20 minutes.

The Chair recognizes the gentlewoman from Colorado.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself as much time as I might consume.

Mr. Speaker, H.R. 11003 amends various provisions of title 3, United States Code, which provide staff assistance to the President. The provisions are quite outdated. They now only permit the President 14 assistants.

The need for this legislation is plain. Presidents have for years employed more than 14 assistants and have for years obtained authority for such hiring through legislative language in annual appropriation acts. However, any such language in an appropriation act is subject to a point of order on the floor of the House. Rule XXI, clause 2, provides that no appropriation shall be reported in any general appropriation for any expenditure which is not previously authorized by law. In recent years, points of order have been offered on the House floor. Although the Senate has restored the funds, and the funds have been retained through conference committee, less accommodating action by the Senate would leave a President with little or no staff and might create a crisis of constitutional proportions.

H.R. 11003 is in one sense a housekeeping measure. It will permit the House once again properly to consider appropriations for White House staff, within the limits it authorizes. It is really a pretty simple bill. All of my colleagues on committees with legislative jurisdiction should have a good idea of what it contains since they all from time to time have acted on a similar bill for an agency within their jurisdiction.

Mr. Speaker, in another sense and because H.R. 11003 does not deal with any old entity in the executive branch, I must caution my colleagues that in voting for the bill, they must consider the implications in the bill beyond its neatening up of the legislative process.

An authorization bill, much more so than an appropriation bill, establishes mechanisms for control and accountability. Certain provisions of H.R. 11003 will impose upon the President standards of reporting on his staff which have never before existed. New section 113, for example, will require the President to report to Congress on his employment of experts and consultants and long-term detailees from other agencies. Other provisions limit the amounts he may pay employees. Another section requires him to report on expenditures from his unanticipated needs funds. These provisions are all limitations upon the President's discretion to hire and spend. They impose accountability.

The central issue before us, in this regard, is whether the Congress should acquiesce in, and by implication, approve of, having Presidents who are unaccountable for their funds and their close staff. To oppose placing limitations upon the President's staff, however strongly we might wish to give him a blank check to get his jobs done, is to ignore the duty and power of Congress under article II, section 2, clause 2 of the Constitution to provide from time to time positions in the executive branch. This provision is one of the tensions which the Founders of our Nation put into the structure of the Federal Government. It must not be compromised by our inaction. It must be conscientiously exercised.

I believe that the provisions of H.R. 11003 are an appropriate exercise of this responsibility. Very simply, it places permanent limitations upon the President as to the taking of certain actions which have in the past been subject to abuse. Any employment of persons for unlawful activities, or personal use of Presidential funds would be subject to oversight. Moreover, Presidents will not be able to hide the true size of their staff through the use of detailees, experts, and consultants will show up on the White House books.

On the other hand, the controls placed upon the President do not represent a blunderbuss approach. The committee bill does not burden the President with writing us a letter every time he hires or fires an employee. It permits him to hire whom he wishes, and it permits, within generous boundaries, good wages to be paid. In essence, it puts upon the President about the same criteria as we ourselves have for our own congressional staffs. Consequently, there is sufficient leeway in the bill for any President in the foreseeable future to have effective help.

Mr. Speaker, I will offer only one further note on this bill. President Carter has personally reviewed it and fully support its terms. It has taken a year of hearings, discussions, and drafting to develop H.R. 11003. I believe that the work which has gone into this bill has paid off in an effective, comprehensive bill.

I urge my colleagues to support H.R. 11003.

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, I rise in support of this bill that does represent literally years of work.

Mr. BAUMAN. Mr. Speaker, under what authority does the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. HARRIS) speak?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Maryland is absolutely right.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, I yield such time as he may consume to the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. HARRIS).

Mr. HARRIS. Mr. Speaker, House consideration today of H.R. 11003, the White House staffing bill, presents us with a historic opportunity to make a fundamental reform of our Government: It reasserts Congress constitutional responsibility and reaffirms our cabinet form of government in the executive branch.

H.R. 11003 accomplishes this in three major ways:

First. It places numerical ceilings on the number of top-level officials, executive levels and supergrades, on the White House staff;

Second. It requires the White House to reimburse agencies that detail employees to the White House, closing a funnel that could lead to adding staff out of funds other than those appropriated for the White House; and Third. It requires full reports to Congress on the number and cost of detailees and consultants in the White House.

EFFORT BEGAN IN 1970

The Post Office and Civil Service Committee's interest in White House staffing patterns began in the early 1970's and resulted in a 1972 report prepared by Congressman UDALL entitled, "A Report on the Growth of the Executive Office of the President, 1955–73." This report notes that the Executive Office of the President was created by Reorganization Plan No. 1, April 25, 1939; the order implementing that plan stated:

In no event shall the Administrative Assistants [to the President] be interposed between the President and the head of any department or agency.

The Executive Office of the President was in no way to subordinate or usurp the cabinet departments. The report details the gradual growth in staffing over 18 years and notes that "over 50 percent of the increase in the Executive Office of the President has occurred since 1970."

The committee's research also revealed that the law is deficient and obsolete. Briefly, the "current" law, dating back to 1939, authorizes six administrative assistants and eight other secretaries or assistants to the President. There is no requirement to reimburse agencies for employees detailed to the White House and many expenses of the White House are not authorized in law.

THE 93D AND 94TH CONGRESSES

In both the 93d and 94th Congresses, White House staffing legislation was considered. H.R. 14715 in 1974 died in a conference committee; H.R. 6706 in 1975 died in the Senate. In the 94th Congress, in the Post Office and Civil Service Committee and in the House I offered a number of amendments to strengthen the bill.

On July 17, 1975, I offered an amendment to H.R. 8597 which contained appropriations for the White House in an effort to curb nonreimbursable details to the White House; the amendment failed. However, on September 1, 1976, I offered an amendment to H.R. 14886, the Presidential Transition Act amendments, which required that all detailees be paid from transition funds. This amendment was adopted.

Additionally, on June 14, 1976, I raised a successful point of order against the 1977 White House appropriations because I believed the appropriations violated House Rule XXI which provides that no appropriation for any expenditure not authorized in law can be in order. Similarly, on June 8, 1977, I made another successful point of order against the 1978 White House appropriation on the same ground. Both times, the Senate restored the funds. Clearly the rules of the House had been circumvented.

THE 95TH CONGRESS

Since we began the current Congress still without an appropriate authorization in law, I introduced H.R. 6236 on April 19, 1977, after seeking the views of the administration. Hearings were held on April 26, 1977, and administration officials testified that they could not address the specific provisions of the bill until the President's reorganization of the Executive Office of the President was completed. A second hearing on my bill was held on September 3, 1977. At this hearing, administration officials testified that a bill was being drafted. Reorganization Plan No. 1 was approved by the House on October 14, 1977.

Over the next 5 months I and my fellow subcommittee members met numerous times with administration representatives and gradually developed H.R. 10657 which I introduced on January 31, 1978, cosponsored by Representatives UDALL, SCHROEDER, DERWINSKI, LEHMAN, SPELLMAN, and STEED. Hearings were held on this bill on February 7 and the administration testified, "President Carter strongly supports this White House authorization bill." The subcommittee approved the bill on a 6-to-1 vote on February 16, and reported a clean bill, H.R. 11003. The full committee ordered H.R. 11003 to be reported on March 8, 1978, by a unanimous voice vote.

In short, it has been an intense, 6-year effort.

STRONG STAFFING LIMITS IN LAW

H.R. 11003 provides authorization for personnel and operations of five units within the Executive Office of the President: The White House Office, the Executive Resident at the White House, the Vice President, the domestic policy staff and the Office of Administration. The bill would place in law the following requirements for assistance to the President: First. It authorizes not more than 50 employees paid at the executive level, a salary range of $47,500 to $57,000. Within this limit, there is a limit of 25 employees paid at executive level II, $57,500 and 25 at executive level III, $52,500. Second. It limits to 50 the number of employees paid at supergrade levels GS–16, 17, and 18 at salaries of $39,629 to $47,500.

The staffing and salary limits for the other units are as follows: Executive residence of the White House: 3 GS–16–18's. Vice President: 8 executive levels and 3 GS–16–18's. Domestic policy staff: 6 executive levels and 18 GS–16–18's. Office of Administration: 5 executive levels and 5 GS–16–18's.

Additional provisions include:

First. An authorization of $1 million for the President's "unanticipated needs";

Second. An authorization for detailing agency employees to the White House and a requirement that agencies be reimbursed for all personnel who are detailed to any of the units for over a period of 180 cumulative days per year;

Third. Varying top salary limits on the hiring of outside consultants for each unit;

Fourth. A full annual report to Congress on the number and cost of detailees and consultants;

Fifth. Authorization for a variety of operations of these offices, including official expenses, assistance to spouses, travel and maintenance of the executive residence; and Sixth. Authorization for the General Accounting Office to inspect documentation of expenses for the purpose of verifying that the expenditures were properly within authorized categories.

In summary, it is a clear, tough bill updating a 39-year-old law and closing loopholes in our statutes.

A STEP TOWARD RESPONSIBLE GOVERNMENT FOR CONGRESS AND ADMINISTRATION

The responsibility for letting White House staffing grow unabated while the law stagnated rests at the doorstep of both the Congress and all recent administration. Both branches of our Government have neglected this important area.

Commendably, President Carter in his campaign and early in his Presidency enunciated his view that the White House staff should be reduced and that policymaking power should be returned to the Cabinet. After an extensive study of the Executive Office of the President, the President submitted Reorganization Plan No. 1 on July 15, 1977, which reduced full-time White House staff positions from 485 to 351—a reduction of 28 percent. This plan was approved in October 1977. H.R. 11003 further carries out the President's mandate by placing in law authority for the staffing and operations of these five Executive Office of the President units.

The House of Representatives, despite several serious and notable attempts, has shirked its responsibilities. We have tolerated appropriation bill after appropriation bill without a legal authorization in place. I have and will continue to question the wisdom of spending public funds for purposes not specified in law. Clause 2 of House rule XXI prohibits legislation in appropriations bills. In this area, we have ducked our responsibility by approving spending measures without first determining with precision for what purposes these funds can be spent. I strongly believe it is wrong to write "blank checks" with taxpayers' money. The challenge here for Congress is one of legislative responsibility and integrity.

So today, this House and this administration are directly undertaking mutual responsibilities to get the central power base of our Government back on the right track.

WHO RUNS THE GOVERNMENT?

Mr. Speaker, my 3-year effort has not been a game of pointing a finger at any President or quibbling about numbers of staffers, be they 100 or 1,000. Staff growth is not inherently bad; as the problems of the seventies become more complex, surely staffing needs must adjust. The fundamental point here is to make sure power is in the hands of accountable people: the Cabinet. Executive advisers and special assistants to the President have their proper advisory role. But our form of government does not vest in them unlimited powers. They are unelected and sometimes inaccessible. Quite simply, our Government should not be run by, and our President should not depend on, a "palace guard."

Centralized power in the hands of a few anonymous individuals is contrary to a democracy. This bill is a very fundamental policy measure reaching to the heart of our Government.

[1] Total employees includes full-time employees and special projects employees. Full-time employees are the average number of employees as printed in the actual budgets for 1934 through 1962.

[2] Detailed employees are as of June 30 of each year.

Mr. GILMAN. Mr. Speaker, I yield myself such time as I may consume.

Mr. Speaker, while I am not in the least surprised, I must confess to having experienced some chagrin over the decision of the White House to coax the majority into taking up H.R. 11003, the White House authorization bill, under today's Suspension of the Rules thereby depriving the Members of the House the means and opportunity by which to test the merits of the several provisions of this bill through the offering of perfecting amendments. H.R. 11003 is simply too important a piece of legislation, too significant in its implications, and too far reaching in its scope to be dealt with in this summary manner.

This bill is, indeed, a historic measure. The law authorizing White House staff was last updated some 30 years ago in 1948. Because it is just conceivable that another 30 years may elapse before the Congress next updates this legislation, it is vitally important that we fashion this measure into a law that will stand on its own merits for possibly another 30 years or more. I submit that this bill in its present form will not stand that test of time.

It is amazing to me, as one who has been involved with this legislation since its inception, that my distinguished colleague, the gentlewoman from Colorado (Mrs. SCHROEDER), the chairwoman of the Subcommittee on Employee Ethics and Utilization, from whence the bill originates—for whom I have the greatest respect—should have forgotten so quickly the lessons we all learned in dealing with the White House in matters concerning pay and staffing. In the evolution of this measure, can we forget the interminable months of delay and obfuscation by the administration, both in providing personnel data for the staff of the subcommittee to study, and representatives to come before our subcommittee for some hard questioning. We need only glance at the various dates of our hearings on the bill to acknowledge the truth of that statement.

For the benefit of my colleagues who may not have had the opportunity to look over the transcript of those hearings, let me call to their attention that our first hearing on authorizations for White House staffing was April 26, 1977. Our next hearing on the subject was September 30, 1977, and our last meeting was February 7, 1978. Yet now my distinguished colleague. the distinguished gentlewoman from Colorado, is willing to support legislation that authorizes ceilings on White House staff, which ceilings, I might add, in some instances nearly doubled the number of the present White House staff, over an indefinite period of time, conceivably 30 years, with little or no meaningful reporting requirements.

In a recent National Journal article of April 1, 1978, entitled, "The 'Lean White House' Has a Fat Staff Authorization in the Works," author Dom Bonarede notes:

Proposed legislation awaiting House action would allow President Carter the most expensive White House staff in history.

The National Journal article goes on to state:

An authorization bill, H.R. 11003, unanimously approved March 16 by voice vote by the House Post Office and Civil Service Committee, would let the President almost double the number of executive level and supergrade aides on his personal White House staff from 55 to 100. Occupants of such senior positions receive annual salaries ranging from $42,500 to $57,500.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GILMAN. I yield to the gentlewoman from New York.

Mrs. SCHROEDER. Mr. Speaker, I think the gentleman has stated correctly some of the facts about the cooperation we have had on this bill and how frustrating it has been and how long it has been around; but some of the accusations the gentleman is making about numbers are not quite accurate. We have to remember this is an authorization bill and not an appropriation bill. It is not the first time this has happened. We often have numbers higher than are appropriated.

I attempted to find the gentleman from Oklahoma (Mr. STEED), who I do not think is in town today, but the gentleman from Oklahoma is the person who chaired the Committee on Appropriations and the numbers, I am sure, will be about the same.
